Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Is not Caleb P. Marsh indictable for having bribed the Secretary of War? And if I am summoned and swear that he confessed before us that he did do so, do I not put him before the grand jury to be indicted?

Mr. KASSON. I hope to God he will be indicted for offering a bribe.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. And did not that threat of the President that he should be prosecuted make him go to Canada?

[Laughter.]
Mr. KASSON. The point is evaded. He went before any such threat was made. Of course the man is indictable and ought to be indicted if there are witnesses to be found to prove the offense. But the other point is the one involved, that he is bound to testify.

we not last winter keep a witness in jail for weeks and weeks, until he finally yielded and testified, because he had taken an illegal posi-tion, that he ought to be protected against being compelled to testify? He was intimidated, but the intimidation amounted to nothing; we got his testimony. And so can this committee, if it is in earnest, get the testimony of any witnesses whose testimony they are entitled to by the laws of the land.

We ought not to be asked to postpone the indictment of the Secretary of War himself, the criminal revealed here on the report of the retary of War himself, the criminal revealed here on the report of the committee; we ought not to postpone his indictment to the distant future on the theory that some possible witness may be scared away, when the committee have it in their power to enlighten the grand and the petit juries as to the facts in the case.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I want to say one word further. Mr. KASSON. I am desirous to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Iowa will allow me to remind him that he promised me to answer a question which he has unwittingly or deliberately ignored. Was it true, as stated in the newspaper reports—newspaper reports-

Mr. KASSON. I remember the question.
Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me state the question.
Mr. KASSON. Not again.
Mr. BLACKBURN. Did the gentleman go with the Iowa delegation and hold an interview with the Secretary of War; and if he did, what secrets did he learn?

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to observe the rules of the House. The question had passed out of my mind, and I do not want it to do so again before I answer it, or I shall have another speech from the gentleman from Kentucky.

A MEMBER. A better speech than your own.
Mr. KASSON. Before the committee had made their report, there came a notification to the entire Iowa delegation in both Houses that the Secretary of War wanted to see them. That was before the committee had made their report; and I for one have never seen that day when I was so much afraid of a man that was down upon his back that if he sent to me a request to see him I would not see him. I tell the gentleman from Kentucky further that if such be the spirit of Kentucky, he cannot find one member of the Iowa delegation that will respond to it. We went in the evening by the request of the Secretary of War; and then we met—what? The gentleman is entitled to it, and he shall have it all. We met this statement: "Gentlemen, when I sent for you I supposed there was to be some opportunity to be heard in the House in some way upon this subject. I have now learned by accident since six o'clock that I am impeached, and that the House has taken order to notify the Senate of the impeachment. It is useless for me to trouble you with what I was going to say touching the evidence in this case." And we left him. Let the gentleman make the most of it; but let him understand that if he thinks it right, Iowa does not think it right to refuse to one of its citizens an interview when he is impeached before the Senate of the United

Mr. AINSWORTH. I desire to ask my colleague if it is true that the Secretary of War sent for the entire Iowa delegation; and, if so, why they left me out. [Loud laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I rather think there were two reasons for it. One

Mr. KASSON. I rather think there were two reasons for it. One is that my colleague [Mr. AINSWORTH] did not see the boy that brought around the requests; and the other is that he happens to come from such a district, politically, that the Secretary of War forgot there was a democratic Representative from Iowa. [Laughter.] But really I do not know whether his name was on the list or not. There was a long list of names; that is all I know.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman mean to say that that little

Mr. KASSON. O, never mind that. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] for a question.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and all the gentlemen on the other side of the House profess to be ready to join earnestly with the democratic side of the House in the endeavor to have these matters thoroughly and properly investigated. Now I want to ask this question: whether they are willing to unite with us in securing the passage of a bill (if it be necessary) through this House and the Senate giving protection to witnesses when they appear in these cases and testify to matters under investigation?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I hardly know whether I comprehend the point of the gentleman's question. There is now a law protecting witnesses from liability for any statement they may make in evidence before a congressional committee. Mr. SINGLETON. I understand that; but it does not when evidence is obtained aliunde. Mr. KASSON. If any law can be devised that can give greater protection, if it does not defeat the ends of justice, we will support protection, it it does not deteat the ends of justice, we will support it unanimously on this side.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman knows perfectly well that while the members of a committee cannot be compelled to disclose what took place in the committee-room, and while witnesses may have protection in that way, yet if others than members of the committee shall come forward and testify in court against these parties, does not the gentleman see that they may thus be made liable to prosecution?

Mr. KASSON. If I understand the gentleman, he is in very great error touching the law. The law for the protection of witnesses, to be found in the Revised Statutes, is explicit, the object being to induce them to make clear and full statements before investigating committees of Congress. I am sure the gentleman misapprehends the law; but if it is defective, we will support any bill to make it more effective.

Mr. SINGLETON rose.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman must excuse me further. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.]
Mr. SINGLETON. The entire extent to which the law goes, as I understand, is this: It does not protect witnesses from criminal pros-

Mr. KASSON. So far as concerns their own evidence it does.
Mr. SINGLETON. The testimony given by them cannot be used against them in a criminal prosecution, but they are liable to be pros-Mr. KASSON.

ecuted in a criminal court upon other evidence.

Mr. KASSON. And ought to be.
Mr. SINGLETON. Now I ask the gentlemen on that side of the House, are you willing to unite with us to afford protection to these witnesses against all detriment that can come to them if they appear and testify in these matters before committees of this House and before a criminal court?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Iowa has yielded to me.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman yielded to me for a question, and I insist upon an answer. I ask for an answer; I am pleading for

man from Massachusetts

Mr. KASSON. I have tried to answer my friend from Mississippi. I wish to say distinctly, if he means to propose a law that if you have twelve criminals, gross criminals, and they all testify to the question of one other criminal, then the whole twelve shall escape punishment, I will not do it. If he means, on the other hand, a reasonable law that will give further protection, if further protection is needed, to procuring testimony and finding out criminals, we will support it. I hope I am now understood.

Mr. HOAR. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to submit the following amendment as a substitute for that offered and now pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the said members be at liberty to attend before said court and give such evidence and produce such documents, if any they have, as relate to the charge against said Belknap for receiving a bribe from one Marsh.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only two or three words Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only two or three words in regard to this matter. I suppose it is clear that if these three gentlemen who have addressed the House had been members of the English House of Commons, they would have been punished as for contempt of the body to which they belonged, forthwith, on their own statements. If any court, or the other branch of Parliament, summons a member of the House of Commons to appear and testify in any mode which is a breach of his privilege, it is necessary first to apply to the house for leave, and the member commits a high contempt or crime if he waives that privilege. Why? Because the privilege is the privilege of the house, and the individual member has no right to waive it.

If these gentlemen are in possession of the secrets of this House, if they are in possession of public documents relating to the pending

If these gentlemen are in possession of the secrets of this riouse, if they are in possession of public documents relating to the pending investigation, then it is a breach of our privilege, not of theirs, if they put themselves within the power of any legal tribunal and by waiver of that privilege enable it to wring from them those secrets. So that they are either wrong in the position they assume, and they have no such secrets in their possession, or they have been guilty of a high contempt of this House.

Now, sir, what is the attitude of this question? It is this: This House has no power and the Senate has no power to punish an American citizen for anything except for contempt. They may protect the American people by removing from office or by preventing the return to office of a corrupt office-holder. But gentlemen must of late years have been reading some other constitution than ours. [Laughter.] They have forgotten our Constitution declares that no man shall be held as answerable for crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury. That is the right of the people and of the citizen as well. No political body eager to find reasons against its political op-

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?
Mr. HOAR. Not at this moment.
No political body eager to make capital for any pending election is intrusted with the august privilege of vindicating the outraged justice of the American people. I will now answer the gentleman from tice of the American people. I will now answer the gentleman from Vi ginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. TUCKER. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to tell the House under what constitution, according to the reading of what constitution was it that Milligan, a citizen of the State of Indiana, was tried capitally without presentment or indictment?

Mr. HOAR. That was under military law, if it was under law at all. That is a different thing; it was in time of war.

Mr. Speaker, now this committee had discharged its function. The members of the committee had received, by conversations, by confession, by investigation, certain facts which tended to prove a high crime had been committed in this District. They communicated those facts, as far as they related to this distinct charge against the Secretary of War of taking a bribe from one Marsh, to the House, and their communication has been published to the country. So far as they are concerned, there is no investigation pending. So far as they are concerned, there is no secret of the House touching this thing in their possession. The matter has been taken from them; they have been discharged and the matter has been committed to another combeen discharged and the matter has been committed to another committee of the House. Now, it seems to me, therefore, and I submit to the cooler judgment of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the duty of the House is to direct that the evidence in the knowledge of these gentlemen, or any documents, if they have any, tending to prove the particular charge against William W. Belknap of taking a bribe from Marsh, may be laid before the judicial tribunal of the country. If on the other hand they are presenting tribunal of the country. If, on the other hand, they are prosecuting their investigation and that subpana duees tecum is too broad in reference to the matter described, it is their duty to plead their privilege in regard to all such matters and refuse to submit themselves to that tribunal for any other investigation.

Now one word, sir, in regard to the question suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Singleton.] I should not be in favor, and I am quite sure with my knowledge of his good seuse he will not be in favor, of such a proposition as he has suggested, and that is of a bill which enacts that whenever a person appears before a committee of either branch of Congress and makes a statement on oath touching any crime he never shall be indicted for that crime.

See where that would lead. Just take the case of a Senate and House of different political parties and of a prosecution or investiga-tion by the House going on against political criminals belonging to the party which is in the ascendancy in the other branch, all that party would have to do would be to institute an investigation by one of its committees, summoning the various officers of the Departments before it and asking them such questions as they chose, and forever those officers would be pardoned for the offense. Mr. Belknap, if it turned out that he appeared before an investigating committee of the Senate and answered some general questions about the matter in pros-ecution, would be pardoned if such a law were put upon the statutebooks.

A MEMBER. Witnesses would volunteer.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose I am violating neither the privilege nor the secrecy of any committee to which I belong if I say that probably a law which will secure all that is desired in regard to this class of cases will be framed and proposed to the House shortly, and will probably receive the united support of all the members of the House. Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.
Mr. SINGLETON. It is perfectly evident to my mind, and I suppose to the mind of every other member who has given attention to this matter, that the reason why Marsh is now missing is altogether on account of the fact that it has been announced everywhere in your papers that no guilty man should escape. He therefore felt that he was particeps criminis in this affair, and thought it best to get out of

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman complain of that policy that no guilty man should escape?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not, sir. And now the whole prosecution eriminally is in danger of failure on account of the absence of this witness. The proposition I make to the gentleman from Massachusetts and to the other side of the House is this: that we shall in regard to this particular witness—not in regard to the witnesses in every case where they shall appear and testify, but in regard to the witnesses in every case where they shall appear and testify, but in regard to the witness or witnesses in this particular investigation and others growing out of it—we give them assurance that they will not be prosecuted; and my word for it, as soon as that is done you will see them here ready to testify.

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield further. But I will put a question to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] which I do not ask him to answer. It is a mere rhetorical statement of an argument.

Do you want Belknap to get off and not have his case presented to the criminal courts of the country for fear you frighten Marsh?

Mr. SINGLETON. Not a bit of it. The whole object, let me say, in this proposition is to prosecute as vigorously as it may be done, that you may have the benefit of the evidence of these witnesses. You have now frightened them off, and that has been as I believe intentional.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against insects; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2282) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. DANFORD. I have no desire whatever to discuss this question of privilege, and I should not have sought the floor were it not for intimations thrown out by the member of the committee from Kentucky, [Mr. Blackburn.] I do not know whether I understood fully the remarks of that gentleman or not. I understood the gentleman to intimate that the republican members of the committee were not so earnest in their desire to prosecute the late Secretary of War as the democratic members of the committee. If the gentleman from Kentucky means by this simply the fact that the republican members of that committee were never present until Wednesday morning last, then I have nothing further to say; but in justice to myself I desire to state that I happen to be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee has been constantly in session for some weeks, having liberty to sit during the sessions of the House. I had been notified twice by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to meet with that committee. I had never met with that committee, for the reason that my time was wholly occupied in the Committee on Naval Affairs, conducting an investigation that has taken a very large amount of testimony. There are gentlemen present who will undoubtedly sustain me in that declaration.

I was notified on Wednesday morning—and I may say that I was kindly notified by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department coming to me at the breakfast-table and so informing me—that important matters were before our committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Were you ever so notified before?

Mr. BLAINE. Were you ever so notified before?
Mr. DANFORD. It was the first notification I had save a formal notification of the meeting of the committee which I had received twice. I never felt badly treated by the committee for the reason as I understood it that the investigations were being conducted at the regular meetings. I had notice of the times when the committee met. I did not appear. The fact, however, is as the chairman will bear me out in saying, that I had no notice of anything special being before the committee until last Wednesday. I did appear upon receiving that notice. I went to the Committee on Naval Affairs and asked the chairman of that committee to postpone the examination of a witness for some time, and I went down to the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, and I hope that my colleague on the committee from Kentucky [Mr. Blackburn] does not intend to intimate that either myself or the other republican member of that committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass,] from that time until the resolutions were reported and passed by this House, were not as vigilant and as earnest in pursuing that inquiry as the democratic members of the committee. Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman permit me a word? Mr. DANFORD. I will.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In justice to him as well as to myself I want to say that the record of this House will show when the resolution which declared that this ex-officer was liable to impeachment was pending before this body, I said that in the committee-room in the matter of agreement on that report we had recognized no difference between republicans and democrats. That was my language substantially, and I trusted the same purpose would be manifested by the republican members of the House. I did then say that, having seen the statement made in the public prints of the country upon the authority of the republican members of that committee, that efforts made by them to retain the absconding witness had failed. I have done to these gentlemen more than justice by my silence. I now take pleasure in attesting the truth of what the gentleman from Ohio says. I had not said before, but after his statement I may say now, and I want the country to know it, that there is not one atom of truth, or fact, or proof that has ever appeared before the committee that I do not want emblazoned before the country. In view of his utterance I feel authorized to say that from the day when Congress convened until last Wednesday, when the proof was all in and signed and sealed no one republican member of that committee ever crossed the threshold of the committee-room, although, as the gentleman from Ohio admits, he was notified more than once to attend. It was then, when a culmination had been reached of the inquiry, that a special messenger was sent to ask these two republican gentlemen to come to the committee-room and read the proof before we made a report to the House; and I now reiterate what I said upon this floor last Thursday, that from that time no democratic member of that committee was more earnest, more vigilant, or more honest in his endeavors to bring this guilty party to justice than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Danford] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass.] That is the whole truth.

Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will read the charge of which I complain; and after the liberal and just manner in which I had treated them on last Thursday, I am surprised at their silence under a charge like this. I read from the New York Tribune of yesterday: CLYMER BLAMED FOR MARSH'S ESCAPE.

WASHINGTON, March 6.

There seems to be a great sensitiveness on the part of the democrats that the only witness in the Belknap case should have been allowed to escape through the thoughtlessness if not imbecility, or some stronger term, of the chairman of their own committee, who is one of the leaders of the party. The republicans seem disposed to press the fact to the disadvantage of the democrats, the more so from the fact that the republican members of the committee urged that Mr. Marsh be detained until the case against Mr. Belknap should be disposed of.

I ask the gentleman from Ohio now to tell whether that charge is true or false

Mr. DANFORD. I desire to say here that I am not the authority for the statement read by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I knew that would be the gentleman's answer; and I ask him now to state whether the charges there made are false Was there any effort made in the committee-room to retain the witness ?

Mr. DANFORD. If it is not conceived by other members of the committee to be a secret, I feel at liberty to state just what my recolcommittee to be a secret, I reel at liberty to state just what my recollection is. On the morning of last Thursday Mr. Marsh came into the committee-room shortly after its meeting and the suggestion was made, either by himself or perhaps by the chairman of the committee, that he be discharged. That was prior to the committee having ascertained the fact whether there would be more testimony or not before the committee. At that time I remember that Mr. Bass, my republican colleague on the committee, suggested that it would be improper to discharge the witness until the investigation was closed, and I think the chairman of the committee will remember that suggestion. Afterward the witness Marsh withdrew. It had been determined that we would take no further testimony before the committee. Mr. Marsh then came in and the question of his discharge was again before the committee, and there was no member of the committee who questioned his right to go.

I believe that my colleague, [Mr. Bass,] who is absent to-day on account of sickness, would bear me out exactly in the statements I make, and the only regret that I have is that Mr. Bass is not present on this occasion.

Mr. CLYMER. I know how desirous my colleague from Ohio on the committee is to do exact justice and state what is fair, and therefore I will try to refresh his memory by this suggestion: whether on the morning when Mr. Marsh appeared, and it was suggested, as I will admit, although I do not remember it personally, that he should be discharged, after that he was not cross-examined by Judge Blair, counsel for Mr. Belknap?

Mr. DANFORD. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. And did not he then say that he had no other or further questions to ask him?

Mr. DANFORD. Undoubtedly.
Mr. CLYMER. And then, in the presence of Judge Blair, and in Mr. CLYMER. And then, in the presence of Judge Blair, and in the presence of the whole committee, did not the witness say: "Are you done with me?" And was not my reply, or the reply of some one, this: "We do not know that we have anything more to ask you." And did not the witness then say: "I want to go to New York." And I remember that I asked him, "When do you propose starting?" and he said, "I would like to get off very early." I asked him if he would go that night, and suggested that if he was going he could get his mileage and pay, and I even went so far as to say that I would go with him to the Sergeant-at-Arms if he was not acquainted with him. I think he intimated that he cared nothing about that. The witness left the room in the presence of and with the consent of the entire left the room in the presence of and with the consent of the entire committee.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It is whether, if a resolution had been offered to the House to take order for the detention of that witness for the purpose of testifying in the impeachment case, it would not have been better, instead of calling the previous question on his resolution, and preventing men who understood their business from attending to it

Mr. BLAINE. And further—
Mr. CLYMER. I want to reply to that question. I want to say that no member of that committee, after seeing the manner of the witness and the fairness of the statement of his evidence, had the least suspicion on earth that he would leave the country.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the gentleman—

Mr. CLYMER. One moment. I say now that he left the country; and if he does not return it is because this case has been pursued with a purpose so as to frighten him from the country.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is not now satisfied that he made a mistake in reporting his resolutions and calling the previous question on them before anybody could suggest the mg the previous question on them before anybody could suggest the proper course to be pursued?

Mr. CLYMER. No, sir; I made no mistake.

Mr. BEEBE. He could not anticipate what your President would do.

Mr. CLYMER. I made no mistake. I let the blow fall, as fall it should, with a swiftness and suddenness calculated to strike terror to all evil-doers.

Mr. DANFORD. I desire to state in relation to the remarks made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLYMER] that, while I do not remember the entire colloquy between himself and the witness Marsh, I do remember the substance of it. The gentleman states correctly what took place in the presence of the entire committee. The only other thing I desire to say is this: in justice to my colleague, Mr. Bass, it ought to be stated here to the House and to the country that he is at this time sick and has been unable to attend even the sittings of the House. And now, as this is a matter of record, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] whom I see present, to bear witness as to the manner in which our time upon that committee is occupied. I ask it in justice to myself.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I take very great pleasure in stating, on behalf of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] that he has been constant and unremitting in his attention to the duties devolved upon him as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Upon one or more occasions I remember that he has called my attention to the fact that he would be absent on duty connected with the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and asked me not to examine a given witness until he returned. I take pleasure further in adding on behalf of my colleague on the committee that I have noticed his honesty and good faith in seeking to develop any matter connected with honesty and integrity in the public service.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution, not the preamble, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the said committee and the members thereof are hereby directed to disregard said mandate until further order of this House.

Mr. COX. I do not intend to detain the House very long in answering the irrelevant talk that has been made by the gentlemen on the other side. Theirs is an old trick, an old fallacy in logic. It is copied from the action of a certain fish of the sea, which emits a large quantity of a certain sort of juice of an inky color, in which to make its escape from attack. There is another pertinent illustration. When some one once spoke in the Roman senate in defense of assassination a senator said that the defenders of assassination were worse than Gentlemen were horrified the other day at some expressions of mine. One member said that they had disgusted the civilized world. I wonder what the civilized world thinks of this nation to-day. What will it think of members talking here about remitting this great matter for which Congress has impeached an unfaithful war minister to a little police tribunal of our own creation? What will it think of try-ing to steal the jurisdiction from us when impeachment was intended by the Constitution, not only as a punishment but as a solemn warning and great ensample to functionaries for all time?

Gentlemen fail to see the distinction between impeachment and its penalties and conviction by a mere police court of this District, which is our creature.

It was said here the other day that the President could pardon a criminal convicted under our statutes in the police court. True; and Congress itself may repeal the very law under which the conviction is had and the convict may go acquitted. Not so with the paramount impeachment.

Mr. BLAINE. Who is objecting to his impeachment?
Mr. COX. You did not object to it the other day.
Mr. BLAINE. Nobody else did or is objecting now.
Mr. COX. Now you sit down and do not play those tricks on me.

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I never received any treatment from the gentle man from Maine while he was in the chair except courtesy. He used frequently to chide me for interrupting discourteously and irregularly other members while they were speaking. That was all right.

Now let him practice what he taught in the chair.

Who objected to this impeachment? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] held that we could not impeach an officer after his resignation.

Mr. HOAR. O, no; will the gentleman permit me to state what was my position?

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to argue that resignation forbade impeachment, and he quoted from Judge Story to prove it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman permit me to explain? I am sure he does not wish to do me injustice.

Mr. COX. After the expression which the gentleman used the other day about my having disgusted the civilized world, he can hardly expect me to yield. [Laughter.] I say that the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day thus quoted Judge Story, and in a melodramatic manner declared: "If I am alone, I will vote against this important in this media as hardly a." peachment in this mode, so hastily."

Mr HOAR. O, no.
Mr. COX. Well, the remark was something of that kind; the Rec-

Mr. COX. Well, the remark was something of that kind; the Record will show it.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman is mistaken altogether.

Mr. COX. Did not the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] plead in behalf of a citizen of his State, the late Secretary of War, for delay? What is the meaning of all this excitement and noise here? Why is your side of the House so unanimous, with the exception of one or two gentlemen, against pursuing this proceeding as the committee has pursued it—in a fair and honorable manner? What has this committee done that is wrong? Simply hesitated to plead their privilege and asked the judgment of the House. Why, sir, the gentleman from Maine said that to plead a privilege such as is recognized in parliamentary rules was a "miserable whiffling, shuffling, backing, in parliamentary rules was a "miserable whiffling, shuffling, backing, and filling sort of thing," and then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says that a man who does not plead it is in contempt of the House!

Mr. BLAINE. I said for the House to plead it.

Mr. COX. Now there is no use for the gentleman to get up any more. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I read a definition of this privilege as given by Jefferson in his Manual, to be found on page 58 of our Digest:

This privilege from arrest, privileges, of course, against all process the disobedience to which is punishable by an attachment of the person; as a subpena ad respondendum, or testificandum, or a summons on a jury; and with reason, because a member has superior duties to perform in another place.

What is the reason for this rule of our action? Simply this: that a Representative who represents a large body of people, or a Senator who represents a State, should not be called by the courts at their pleasure to leave their seats. He holds superior allegiance. If it were otherwise, might we not be left without a quorum here? Might we not have great difficulty in proceeding with the public business? The object of a privilege of this kind is that the public business shall go on. Public duty is paramount to all your police courts and with all their attachments and subpensa duces tecum. Ah! gentlemen say that they would allow this petty court of the District to take all the records of this committee and all documents from our control all the records of this committee and all documents from our control and possession, including the main evidence in writing—that is the Marsh-Evans contract—before the grand jury of that court; they would allow them to be there examined; they would have this committee take them all down to that jury-room. What for? To aid the object of their procurement? To cleanse the public service and to punish for high crimes and misdemeanors? To facilitate the procedure inaugurated for impeachment? No. To indict and punish Marsh? The gentleman shakes his head; he does not want to punish Marsh, I suppose.

Mr. BLAINE. The subpœna was only for the Belknap case; don't dodge behind Marsh.

Mr. COX. Just wait; I can fix you on that. [Laughter.] I was raised in a clerk's office; I have issued thousands of subpænas duces tecum and understand the duty of a grand jury. That process is a notice under penalty to the witness to come with all the documents named in the process.

Mr. BLAINE. In the case of Belknap.

Mr. BLAINE. In the case of Deikhap.

Mr. COX. O! but the subpena is to appear before the grand jury; and if it appears before the grand jury, upon inquiring as to Belknap, that Marsh is guilty, the grand jury, as the gentleman knows, is bound to find an indictment against Marsh; and hence you press this thing. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman permit the one months.

Mr. COX. No, sir.
Mr. BLAINE. One moment only.
Mr. COX. No, sir.
Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment by the gentleman's courtesy.
Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Maine is out of order, and nobody knows it better than himself.

[Laughter.]
Mr. BLAINE. That depends on whether the gentleman from New York yields to me. Does the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. COX. I decline. You know the other day you declined to yield to me. [Laughter.] The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York does not yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I now understand it too. [Laughter.]
Mr. COX. There is nobody I would rather hear speak than the honorable gentleman from Maine; but he does not seem to keep his temper very even on this question. I do not know why he should be so anxious to protect this Administration. It has not been see anxious to take care of him. [Laughter.] Perhaps he thinks this matter will kill the Administration and then his chance will be better to be a Senter or representing of these services.

But the point I make is this—you cannot get over it; you cannot get under it; you cannot get around it; you have got to come up and meet it—it is this: If these committeemen testify, and these papers and testimony are carted to the room of the grand jury sitting as an inquest in secret, and inquiring into all offenses, and that contract signed by Marsh, not by Belknap, is read by them, the indictment will not be against Belknap but against Marsh; and therefore you are pursuing Marsh in this way.

Mr. KASSON made a remark which was not heard.

Mr. COX. I cannot hear that talk in the seat over there. It is irregular; I cannot answer it; and I hope it will not be put into the RECORD like some other bad things I have seen.

This suspicion of rascality in the administration of the Government has been in men's minds for a good many years. After all our minority trials and troubles for a long time our investigations have proved almost fruitless. Nearly all of them were suppressed by the kind and patriotic efforts of gentlemen on the other side. [Laughter.] I do not wonder that the gentlemen of this committee charged with this duty were a little reluctant to confer with gentlemen on the other side in respect to these peculiar matters or to submit their evidence to other and insignificant tribunals.

When it is charged, as it is here, that this matter transpired in time to affect an election it is about the best defense of the crime possible. Then it is said that it is brought out for some malicious purpose, and when failing to defend the badness, they turn around and inculpate the committee for something. They abuse the plaintiff's counsel like the lawyer in the old story. This mode of defense does not look like the high moral tone of the party which is claimed to be based on moral ideas. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that we have had investigations heretofore under republican auspices. I served two months on the committee on the "Black Friday" panic. We had to go up and down Wall street and Broad street; and we rushed from Washington County, Pennsylvania, to Washington City, District of Columbia, to obtain our proofs. We unearthed much that was infamous. We brought matters almost up to the very portals of power. How were we treated then? I have at last accidentally found in my committee-room the journal of the Currency Committee. It was under the au-thority of that committee that this Black Friday was examined. I have an abstract here which I will give you now, and I do not care whether it affects the New Hampshire election or not. [Great laughter.] It ought to affect it. It ought to make honest men vote for the democratic party this year. [Applause.] Now, what is that record? On the 1st of February, 1870, after certain revelations, Mr. Cox offered a resolution that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency should confer either per-sonally or in writing with the President of the United States in reference to the testimony given before the committee referring to him or his family, and that the President be respectfully requested to state whether, after considering the matter, he desired to be heard before the committee, or otherwise, with reference to said evidence. That resolution was agreed to.

On the 4th of February Mr. GARFIELD, the chairman, reported that he had, in pursuance of instructions, called upon President Grant and stated to him that in some of the testimony given before the committee personal reference was made to himself and to some of the members of his family, and inquired whether he desired to make any suggestions or statements concerning the same.

Mr. Garfield also reported:

The President desired me to express his thanks to the committee for their courtesy, and to say that he preferred not to see the testimony nor to make any suggestions or statements in reference to it during the progress of the investigation.

Whereupon Mr. Cox offered the following resolution: Resolved. That the committee summon the President of the United States

On motion, the consideration of the resolution was postponed. On the 5th of February Mr. Cox moved to summon General Dent. and Mr. Jones moved to summon Mrs. Corbin. The consideration of the resolutions was postponed to the 8th of February, and on that day, after a great deal of trouble and trial, the motion of Mr. Cox to summon the President was taken up.

Mr. Coburn (a republican) moved to amend by requesting the President to appear before the committee to testify. The amendment was lost by the following vote, democrats in italics:

Yeas—Messrs. Coburn, Lash, Cox, and Jones—4. Nays—Messrs. Judd, Smith, Packer, Burchard, and the chairman, Mr. Gar-

The vote was then taken on the original resolution offered by Mr. Cox. It was lost as follows, democrats in italics:

Yeas-Messrs. Cox. and Jones-2. Nays-Messrs. Judd, Coburn, Smith, Packer, Lash, Burchard, and the chair-NAYS—Messrs. Judd, man, Mr. GARFIELD—7.

The reason given for not requesting or summoning the President was that he claimed to be a co-ordinate branch of the Government. And there was no way of reaching him so as to obtain his testimony. We could only impeach, not investigate by his own evidence. In spite of the precedents of Jefferson and Lincoln, who had appeared before congressional committees without objection, they refused to summon him. They voted it down, as also the motion to summon Mrs. Corbin, General Dent, and Mrs. Grant. On the 9th of February, 1870, the motion of Mr. Jones to summon Mrs. Corbin was taken up, and it was lost by the following vote:

Yeas—Messrs. Cox. Jones, and Burchard—3. Nays—Messrs. Judd, Smith, Packer, Lash, and the chairman, Garfield—5.

Mr. Jones moved that the testimony of Mrs. Grant be taken. Lost by the following vote:

Yeas—Messrs Cox and Jones—2. Nays—Messrs. Smith, Judd, Packer, Lash, Burchard, and the chairman, Gar-

Mr. Cox's resolution to summon General Dent was then taken up, and lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. PACKER, Lash, Cox, and JONES—4.
NAYS—Messrs. Judd, Smith, BURCHARD, and the chairman, GARFIELD-

Thus the House will see how republican investigations proceeded and why they were so vain. This was the way testimony was taken in that committee in these matters. We could not get at the facts. There was no way to get at them. We could not present them to the country fairly. They slammed the door in our face. We knocked at it in vain.

Now when at last the people have sent us here to do this investigating duty and go through all the Departments; when our resolutions propose thoroughness and justice, and when this Committee on War Expenses have done it honestly and discreetly, an attempt is made in this District and in this House to aid a petty police court to take away from them their papers and facts to avoid the supreme odium away from them their papers and tacts to avoid the supreme odition of impeachment; nay, more, to drive from the land in terror all those who would give testimony on this and other subjects pertaining to malfeasance in office. There arises at once, without reason, a full chorus of defense from gentlemen on the other side against such

But, sir, the people will take notice of what you are doing; and hereafter you will be called to account for making this pettifogging attack upon an honest, fair attempt to investigate the pitiful putresence which runs through all our Departments. [Applause.]

Mr. BRIGHT. It is with some regret that I intrude any remarks on the attention of the House. What I have to say I will endeavor to say without passion and with all candor. What is the matter that we have in hand? A committee has been appointed by this body. Their authority is derived from this body. They have reported back and recommended articles of impeachment against a high Government official. The House has taken action, and proceedings are now pending to arraign the official for trial before the Senate as the high court of impeachment. The jurisdiction has already attached, and the Senate is vested with plenary judicial power to proceed to judgment. In this state of the case what authority has a subordinate judicial tribunal to interpose its power and wrest the jurisdiction and compel the delivery of the testimony in the keeping of the superior court? Why, sir, I had always supposed that even in a case of concurrent why, sir, I had always supposed that even in a case of concurrent jurisdiction the jurisdiction which first attached to the person in criminal proceedings held its jurisdiction until it was exhausted. The prisoner could not be held on trial before two tribunals at the same time. Though the Senate as an impeaching court might proceed without the presence of the prisoner, yet the prisoner would have the right to be present.

But what is the meaning of this effort to oust Congress of its jurisdiction? I apprehend the result would be, whether so intended or not, to intimidate the leading witnesses and drive them beyond the jurisdiction of the court and Congress, and thus procure the acquittal of the grand offender by default of testimony. And the judgment of such acquittal would be pleaded in bar of the prosecution of impeachment in the Senate; but whether it could be successfully pleaded is another question.

This indecent haste to arrest the documentary evidence in the keeping of Congress seems to smack of design. There is no absolute necessity for such immediate proceeding. The prisoner might have been secured by arrest and held in bail.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the proceedings in the inferior court might become illegal if resorted to for the purpose of getting up prosecutions or indictments against the witnesses whose testimony would convict the prisoner and by intimidation keep them from the court. I say so because we have a highly penal statute which prohibits the intimidation of witnesses by threats or otherwise. If the court is resorted to as an instrument of intimidation, so much the Congress has ample jurisdiction and capacity to try the high offender who has been summoned before its bar.

It is a part of the history of all governments that the reign of high crimes and misdemeanors can only be arrested at times by securing the testimony of accomplices; and the state gives immunity to the informer as a consideration for the advantage of his testimony.

Every one must know that if indictments are found in the inferior tribunal which has attempted to oust Congress of its acquired jurisdiction and before the immunity is secured to accomplice witnesses, they would in terror fly from the jurisdiction of the court.

I believe this attempt of the inferior court to deprive Congress of its acquired jurisdiction will inspire the conviction in the country that this court has been used only as a scape-goat to allow the crimthat it would be only a proceeding to drive away thieves outside of the Cabinet to protect thieves in the Cabinet.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?
Mr. BRIGHT. No, sir; I cannot yield. I will be through in a mo-

The people expect us to do our whole duty. If official corruption is spreading into the Cabinet and Cabinet ministers are dropping like putrescent arms from the executive family, let the work go on, stripping limb by limb until the purification is complete. And if necessary let a thunderbolt fall on the head of even the highest official in the nation.

This regenerating power rests with the people and with Congress. It should be the glory of a republic to demonstrate to the nations of the earth that it has the power of self-purification, and that no offi-cial, however high, who has betrayed his trust, sullied the glory of this country, and brought reproach on its institutions, shall escape the just punishment of his crime. While the American abroad will feel his face mantling with burning shame as he reads the record of official corruption, he will exult in the fact that there is virtue enough left in the land to uncover and strike down the offenders.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House further. These gentlemen of the committee were nothing but the ministerial officers of the House. They have reported back the condition of things. They ask the advice of the House. The request is proper, and should be granted. Let them be protected and let the impeachment proceed. I yield to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. Blackburn.]

Mr. Blackburn. I have no idea, Mr. Speaker, of inflicting another speech upon the House. This discussion has wandered widely from the purpose of the resolution. As members of the committee, called to waive our privilege as members of this House, we sought instructions from the House as to whether or not it should be done.

nsurfactions from the House as to whether or not it should be done.

Now I asked the floor and I received it through the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bright,] to call the House back from its wanderings to the point, and that is whether a member of the House shall waive his privilege and appear before a petty inferior court of the country to testify to the public detriment on matters then pending in investigation before his committee? If it is the pleasure of the House that this should be done, no man will yield more prompt obedience than myself, but I do not desire to assume the responsibility of taking that action in the absence of instructions from this House and I desire to put on record this passage from Jefferson's Manual:

The privilege of a member is the privilege of the House. If the member waive it without leave, it is a ground for punishing him, but cannot in effect waive the privilege of the House.

I hold that under this authority no member of this House has a right to waive his privilege without at the same time incurring the responsibility of the penalty which the House may inflict upon him. I read further from the same work:

Privilege is in the power of the House, and is a restraint to the proceedings of inferior courts, but not of the House itself.

The privilege, sir, is a restraint upon the proceedings in the inferior courts. It is a privilege which pertains to the House as well as to the member, and the member could not waive it without incurring the penalty of such punishment as the House may deem proper to inflict.

I need not call attention to the fact that a case arose in 1866 where a member of this House was arrested and incarcerated in the twentyeighth judicial district of Pennsylvania. A warrant was issued here, signed by the Speaker, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to go there and assert the privilege of the House in the person of its member.

The member was arrested on a charge of having swindled persons out of the sum of $100,000. On the presentation of that order of the Speaker the prison doors were thrown open and that member of Congress was returned to his duties and set free.

Now I call the attention of the House to the question which the committee are asking. We hold our privilege subject to the House, and we ask if we are to waive it; and if so, when to do it, or to tell us when we shall withhold it, in order to promote the work now going on of exposing corruption, convicting thieves, and purifying the administration of the Government, which in God's name has suffered long enough at your hands.

Sir, this committee has been established for eleven years, and if it ever made a report or held a meeting before I cannot find it on record. The transactions involved in this case reach back to 1870. Republican Congresses from that day to this have been unable or unwilling to find a flaw, but Within ninety days after a democratic committee had taken charge of the matter a Cabinet officer topples from his pedestal, THE PUTRID CARCASS of CORRUPTION WAS EXPOSED IN SUCH hideous rottenness as to disgust, sicken, and appall the country. The question now is whether this work shall stop, whether the unconvicted thieves are to go unwhipped of justice, or shall we stand upon the privilege which the Constitution of the country gives and the interests of honest government demands that we shall assert?

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.
Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] allow me a moment before he proceeds?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr.

Mr. HOAR. Before the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] proceeds, I wish to advert to something which was said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.] which he would not permit me to correct when he was speaking. I did not express the other day any opinion that an officer could not be impeached after he had gone out of office. I did say that two members of the committee had stated, as I understood them, that they had not investigated that question. I said this: that I thought it very likely when the evidence was printed it would be found that the House might adopt the conclusion to which the committee had arrived. I pleaded, however, for time, over night, to see the evidence in print, to look into a question so important that Judge Story intimated very strongly his opinion that it should not be done. That was the whole of it.

Mr. COX. That was not the whole of what you said, sir.
Mr. HOAR. I must decline to yield. I did not express the opinion as to whether or not a man can be impeached after he has left office, as to whether or not a man can be impeached after he has left office, but the House has the right to secure the rights of the American people against the return to office of an office-holder after he has gone out of office under a criminal charge. That is, the President of the United States is not to be permitted to return to political office any guilty adviser or counsellor of his by reason of his escaping the judgment of impeachment, and the test of whether the remedy is still possible depends upon the question whether the judgment you are to get by it is still possible and of effect. But it came upon the House at once and as a new question. The previous question was called even once, and as a new question. The previous question was called even before any explanation or discussion. The committee said to us, you are to have this or nothing. All I argued for was an opportunity until the next morning to examine the question.

Now in regard to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] adverted to, if he will give me his attention for a moment, in regard to the very severe personal criticism which I made upon some previous language of the gentleman. Two minutes before I arose I had not intended to speak on the occasion to which he refers, and when I replied to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Coox.] And while on my feet and in the heat of debate I said what I thought about that language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.] just as the gentleman himself afterward said he had in the heat of debate uttered the language to which I referred. And I dare say, whatever I may have thought in disapprobation of that language, that the long friendly relations which had existed between him and me would have prevented from me a public utterance of so severe a criticism, just as I am sure the gentleman from New York would have abstained from the public utterance of what he said about the gentleman from Maine

the public utterance of what he said about the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] if he had taken any time to consider it.

But I say to the gentleman—and I say this very good-naturedly—he must not find too much fault with my saying that wherever the knowledge of that utterance had gone it had disgusted the civilized world, for when I got through the gentleman rose and said that on reflection he was disgusted with it himself.

Mr. COV. I did not say that

Mr. COX. I did not say that.
Mr. HOAR. You said that in substance.
Mr. COX. O, no; not at all.
Mr. BLAINE. I think there are two or three misapprehensions or misconceptions that might arise in connection with this debate, and I will trespass long enough upon the time of the House to correct them.

First, in regard to the question of privilege to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has adverted. It is quite evident that the gentleman has the right not to waive his privilege; and even that the gentleman has the right not to waive his privilege; and even if the House gives its full permission, he still has the right not to waive it. The privilege is absolute, and unless the member shall himself have done some guilty act, neither the House nor any other power can divest him of that privilege. All this talk about putting the great privileges of the House of Representatives at the beck and bid of a little police court becomes totally irrelevant. Nobody is contending here that the summons of that court is binding upon this House of Representatives or upon any member thereof. Let me put a case to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN 1 Suppose a to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Blackburn.] Suppose a murder were committed here by a member of the House-and it is not beyond the realm of imagination to suppose such a case.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Murder is an excepted case.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose the murder is committed, and none but members of the House are witnesses of the crime. Three members of this House see another member murder an innocent man, and they are summoned to testify in a criminal court. At once the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] waxes eloquent and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] waxes indignant at the idea of a police court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming the court presuming to come in here and to ask honorable gentleman from the court presuming the cou men of this House to assist in the prosecution of the crime, to go before the grand jury to testify.

Now, what is this case? A great crime is charged upon a high officer of the Government. The gentlemen who represent the committee of this House are the sole depositaries of the evidence on which that officer may be indicted. They have possession of all the papers, they have possession of every shred of testimony, and they are respectfully asked to go before the grand jury of this District and assist in indicting that man for the crime. Forthwith the wrath of the majority side of this House is aroused, and gentlemen cry out, This is done to prevent impeachment.

Why, sir, it has nothing whatever to do with the question of impeachment. The Constitution expressly provides—and I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bright,] whom I have always heretofore regarded as a good lawyer, to read that Constitution—the Constitution expressly provides that the jurisdiction of the House and Senate for impeachment and the jurisdiction of the criminal courts for indictment and trial go hand in hand. No one here refuses; there is no one here, so far as I know, but what desires, demands that Belknap shall be impeached.

I have the fullest conviction, and although it is not precisely pertinent to this debate yet I will express it—I have the fullest possible conviction, after I think very mature reflection, that no officer who commits an impeachable offense can escape impeachment by resignation. No tender of resignation in any form, be it complete or incomplete, nor acceptance of it, can take from the people the right of impeachment, the right to protect themselves by declaring that he shall never thereafter hold any office of honor or profit; and therefore, with a clear conscience, on the presentation which these gentlemen made on Thursday last, I voted to present General Belknap for impeachment. And I have been waiting with some impatience for the articles of impeachment to be reported. Five days have elapsed. What is the hitch?

Mr. BEEBE. You have run the witness off.
Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAINE. Have not any witnesses! I never yet knew a prosecuting attorney to hold back an indictment of a man because there was a possibility that at the next term of the court some witness might not be present. That is a very flimsy excuse, gentlemen. Your business is to indict the man. The House of Representatives is the grand jury in the case of impeachment. Bring forward your articles; you will find a unanimous vote on this side sustaining them, so far as I know, if they are in accordance with the facts. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoan] explained—and I listened with great interest, as I always do, to his remarks in regard to the opinion of Justice Story—there may be some ground of doubt as a legal question. But for myself I do not have any; and I do not believe that that doubt, however strongly it may exist, will control the vote of a sizely may on this side. single man on this side. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Con-GER] correctly suggests, the Senate will decide that question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] will excuse me if I use strong language, and say that he was paltering in a double sense and talking in a very paltry manner when he said this was an attempt to keep back the impeachment of Belknap. When the vote was taken the other day on the resolutions of impeachment the Speaker of the House, the honorable gentleman from Indiana, was in the chair; and he stated that the resolutions were agreed to unanimously; the RECORD so states; the Journal so states. So that any attempt to create the impression in the country that there is reluctance or evasion or unwillingness on this side of the House to indict and try Belknap is uncandid, unfair, and untrue.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to state my legal proposition again? My proposition was that the Congress of the United States was one jurisdiction that had the right to try the of-fense and impeach the Secretary of War; that while that was so there was a subordinate court that had concurrent jurisdiction; but that Congress having first obtained jurisdiction, that jurisdiction could not be ousted.

Mr. BLAINE. But there is no conflict. Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir, there is a conflict. Yes, sir, there is a conflict. Not the slightest.

Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. BRIGHT. You cannot put a man upon trial in two tribunals at the same time.

Mr. BLAINE. O! the gentleman still further shakes my faith in him as a lawyer.

Mr. BRIGHT. Here is the first tribunal; it has ousted the inferior

Mr. BRIGHT. Here is the first tribunal; it has ousted the interior jurisdiction for the time.

Mr. BLAINE. O! the gentleman mixes things so that it would take me an hour to untangle them. The object of impeachment is not punishment. If it were so, a person impeached might cite in his defense the provision of the bill of rights that no person shall twice be subjected to peril of life or limb for the same offense. There is nothing application of the provision of the provision of the same offense. be subjected to peril of life or limb for the same offense. There is nothing punitive designed in impeachment; punishment may be an incident, but the object is wholly and solely protective; and I want the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bright,] lest I might lose all faith in him as a lawyer, to listen to this point: that the possession of the person is not at all requisite in impeachment. What do you want with the custody of the person impeached? You cannot even compel him to answer in person. I have sat for weeks as a member of this House in a case of impeachment in which the person impeached never presented himself. The punishment does not go to the person. Let him fly to the ends of the earth, in so far as impeachment goes, and it is still as valid and as far-reaching as the life of the ment goes, and it is still as valid and as far-reaching as the life of the man. It is a disqualification to hold office of honor, or trust, or profit, and there it ends. The criminal law comes in to punish.

Now that under this paltry subterfuge you are going in this House to hold back the evidence that would enable the grand jury now in session in this city to indict this man for criminal trial is something which (I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not think that I am saying this in any spirit of bravado) I cannot persuade myself, and will not believe until the yeas and nays show it, that this House will dare to. If you do, you throw yourselves distinctly and unqualifiedly across the path of criminal justice. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fort] suggests, if the man were in the penitentiary, impeachment could proceed just as well. Impeachment has nothing to do with it. There is nothing in the world to arrest impeachment but death.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Well, yes, I will.

Mr. WARREN. Is there not one thing that might stop it—the loss

Mr. WARLEN. Is there not one thing that hight stop it—the loss of the evidence by which it can be proved?

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; but why are you going to assume now that you will not have the evidence? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Warren] is, I believe, a lawyer. Did he ever know a grand jury— Mr. HOAR. The evidence is within the knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly. Here is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACK-BURN,] the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBENS.] I believe they have somewhat edged out the republican members. And I must here remark, after some length of service in the House of Representatives, that I heard in that report of this committee what pained me. I never before have seen the proprieties of parliamentary usage violated by referring to the "democratic members of the committee" in an official report. That, at least, is a new precedent and a new light in this House. Yet the official report of that committee speaks of the "democratic members of the committee."

The gentleman from Kentucky states in his affidavit that he conferred, not with the members of the committee, but with "the democratic members of the committee."

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman from Maine permit me? He asserts that in the report certain members of the committee are reasserts that in the report certain members of the committee are referred to as democratic members of the committee. Surely he is mistaken. It is not in the report, but in the statement accompanying the report.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course in the report; why not? It is part of the res gestæ; just as much a part of the report as any other part of it.
Mr. CLYMER. No.
Mr. BLAINE. What report was that in?

Mr. CLYMER. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine whether in any other report he ever read of a Secretary being impeached. [Applause.

I do not know. Because a Secretary is being impeached by the House, I do not see why therefore the parliamentary proprieties and amenities ought not to be observed.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not think anybody considers them violated by the report which has been submitted from our committee, unless, perhaps it may be the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, you are one of the democratic members of the ommittee. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine whether in the report, as a report, there is any reference to the politics of the members, and whether that reference is not in one of the exhibits?

Mr. BLAINE. What is the report?
Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It is not in the report, but only in one of the exhibits.

Mr. BLAINE. But I take the liberty of asking, if the exhibits are

Mr. BLAINE. But I take the liberty of asking, if the exhibits are not to be-considered as part of the report, what is the report?

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will allow me. There are in these exhibits reference to various parties; that some are thieves, some liars, scoundrels.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman does not mean that calling a man a democratic member is the same as calling him a thief and a liar. [Great laughter.] That is his logic. But I know he cannot mean it, and I will not permit him to be so understood.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It seems that certain thieves are being convicted who for five years in a republican House have gone "scot-free," and who are being convicted because a majority of democrats were on that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAINE. I rejoice in everything they have done.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I hope you do, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from New York takes the ground with some plausibility that the papers in this case, that the subpensa, the process, the intendment of the whole proceeding, relate solely to the late Secretary of War, and if by any possibility those papers should get there Marsh might be indicted. What for? If that be the case, if it be the sole object of the American people to keep Marsh from indictment, then of course you cannot try Belknap. But suppose you succeed, according to the apprehension of the gentleman from New York is indicting Marsh, what will be be indicted in the subjected for? Year was a suppose you succeed, according to the apprehension of the gentleman from New York is indicting Marsh, what will be be indicted to the process. pose you succeed, according to the apprehension of the gentleman from New York, in indicting Marsh, what will be be indicted for? For bribing a public officer, a high crime. I believe bribery is a crime at common law, and I believe Marsh can be brought back under the excommon law, and I believe Marsh can be brought back under the extradition treaty. My judgment is, if you seriously wish to get hold of Marsh, the quickest way would be to lay the extradition treaty upon him. Why not?

A MEMBER. It is against the law.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to know whether bribery is not included in our extradition treaty?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No. Mr. BLAINE. Then what cases are included in the extradition treaty?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The cases are these

Mr. BLAINE. I have not read the treaty, and I should like to hear them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will read them. They are these: Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, and utterance of forged papers. That is under the treaty of 1842.

Mr. BLAINE. I think he might be brought back under an indictment for robbery. I venture to say that if you send over for him on that indictment you will get him. Will you indict Belknap and then bring in your bill to protect Marsh?

Mr. TUCKER. Does the gentleman say that Marsh has been guilty of robbing?

Mr. BLAINE. It looks as if he had conspired to rob several companies of cavalry in the United States service.

Mr. BEEBE. I should like the gentleman from Maine to let me assist him. I think he could be clearly taken under an indictment for arson in having fired the indignation of the republican party.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is so keen that he puts me in mind of an anecdote of the late Mr. Stevens. Upon a brilliant sally being made by an ambitious member of the House on one occasion, Mr. Stevens said: "I had no idea my friend had so much wit, but I observe he has just so much." [Langhter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want it understood by the country that the whole force and strength of the republican party in the House of Representatives will be used and exercised to secure Belknap's impeachment and his trial and conviction in the criminal court. I want it distinctly understood that, under this throwing of dust about the privilege of the House, is an attempt to hold somebody in Washington, the President of the United States, or some subordinate, responsible. There is no possibility of fixing that accusation.

I have said nothing to the gentleman from Pennsylvania thus far in regard to the witness Marsh; but I will here undertake to say, and

I desire his attention, that, coming to the conclusion as he did, and as the House seconded him in it, that Belknap was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of impeachment, and that the conviction must hang upon the testimony principally of one witness, at least he was very lax in public duty not to take some means for detaining that witnes

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr BLAINE. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. I said heretofore that no member of that committee had the least cause to suppose that the witness would leave the ountry. Let me say further— Mr. BLAINE. O! wait. If the gentleman speaks now it is by my courtesy, and it is more courtesy than I have had shown to me. But the gentleman shows by his own testimony that Marsh had been on the eve of leaving the country a week before, and that the man was a fugitive by desire at that moment.

Mr. CLYMER. He came voluntarily before the committee, of his own accord, and we had no reason to suppose that he would not come again. Now, pray, let me ask the gentleman from Maine a question in return. What power had we to detain him? I say we are not of those who think it competent for any one to touch a bell and deprive a man of his liberty, thereby exercising a power greater than that exercised by the Queen of Great Britain.

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer the gentleman by asking him what power or pressure there was on him to discharge the witness on that day? In my judgment Marsh would not have dared to leave the city until he was discharged. I have been in Congress for a long time and have seen a good many investigations; and I have seen witnesses in situations likely to imperil their personal liberty in a very serious degree; yet I never saw a witness in my life that dared to go away until he was discharged by the committee before which he had been subpænaed.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Maine has made an innuendo that he knows to be false and ungenerous in regard to my personal motives; and I will not permit him or any one else in this House to

Mr. BLAINE. I have made no such innuendo. The gentleman need not go into such high-jinks over it.

Mr. CLYMER. You are in the habit of doing that; but you shall not do so with me.

Mr. BLAINE. There is not the slightest need for the gentleman showing so much temper, for I have made no personal imputation on

Mr. CLYMER. You have; and so it will appear on the record, if the reporters took you correctly down.

Mr. BLAINE. I said the gentleman had been lax in his public duty.

Mr. CLYMER. And you said you would like to know the reasons

Mr. CLYMER. And you said you would nee to know the reasons why I had let this witness escape the jurisdiction of the House?

Mr. BLAINE. I said I would like to know—

Mr. CLYMER. What reasons could there be, if there are any, other than corrupt ones? And another thing you said was, if the gentleman would tell what pressure was brought to bear on him to induce him to go on.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman misapprehends me entirely. I said on him to discharge that witness.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman said, under what pressure was it? It was offensive and untrue, and the gentleman ought not to have made such an innuendo.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman need not have shown such extreme Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman need not have shown such extreme sensibility. There have been very large and reckless charges made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania himself and those associated with him have attempted to hold up this side of the House before the country as reluctant in the prosecution of this mater, as doing something or other to evade or avoid it. There is nothing whatever on the record that sustained that charge, and when I said, as I did say, that the discharge of the witness Marsh by that committee whether the record that sustained that charge, and when I said, as I did say, that the discharge of the witness Marsh by that committee, whether by one or by all its members, is the cause of his absence from this city to-day, I said nothing but what is the fact on record.

Mr. CLYMER. Of which the people will judge.

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing that our appeal shall be made to the people, and that cannot possibly be avoided. Now there is an attempt to say that there is a privilege in this House about to be violated, and that we are proposing to submit ourselves to the police court.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me one question right there i

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. Did the witness leave this city until the Cabinet had issued its orders, and declared that it would punish everybody engaged in this matter?

Mr. BLAINE. What orders?

Mr. CLYMER. And it was right in the line of the order issued by Attorney-General Pierrepont, the district attorney closing the mouths of those engaged in the prosecution.

Mr. BLAINE. Did you say that the Cabinet issued an order?
Mr. CLYMER. They held a meeting, and took care to publish their proceedings.

Mr. BLAINE. What about?

Mr. CLYMER. About what they would do to witnesses in this case, which had the effect of driving them out of the country.

Mr. BLAINE. I undertake to say that the gentleman cannot show an instance in which allusions were made in any Cabinet meeting to the witness to whom he referred.

Mr. CLYMER. I say that in the next morning's papers there was a report of a Cabinet meeting—[loud cries of "No!" "No!"]—there was a publication by telegraph recounting the proceedings at a Cabinet meeting held the night after the impeachment of General Belknap, in which, whether stated by authority or not, it was intimated that anybody who appeared as a witness before an investigation committee should be punished.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his responsible position in this House, call up fugitive telegrams in newspapers and hold the Cabinet of the United States responsible for what is stated therein ?

Mr. CLYMER. I will say to the gentleman, in this report of the Cabinet meeting Mr. Marsh was mentioned by name in that dispatch. Mr. BLAINE. How does the gentleman connect that with the Cabinet?

Mr. CLYMER. Ah, sir, it is so natural; the Attorney-General wrote a letter to the republican officers connected with his office, directing them not to allow accomplices to testify.

Mr. BLAINE. I undertake to say that no action has been indicated or initiated, or I believe designed, either remotely or otherwise, or even discussed in the Cabinet, in relation to any prosecution of a witness against General Belknap. The whole thing is a gross fabrication, not by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] untess he should get on his high horse again, but because he has been too credulous in believing what he sees in the newspapers.

Mr. CLYMER. If the gentleman will not make insinuations against me I shall not be aggrieved by them.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] want to hold this prisoner in order to bring him up in chains to be impeached before the Senate. I believe that is the law they preached. They never, I believe, studied the doctrine of impeachment. There is no need what-ever of having Mr. Belknap here. Where he is wanted is in the crim-inal courts of the country, and this House of Representatives, if we adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR, ] declares that he shall not go there. I charge that that is the result; I do not speak of the intent. I charge that that is the palpable, undeniable result, and I here repeat that it is absolutely puerile to talk to-day about not holding him for indictment before the grand jury because one or two months hence when he may come for trial before because one or two months hence when he may come for trial before a petit jury you imagine, or guess, or fear, or apprehend that some witness may not then be on hand. Nobody doubts that we have plenty of evidence to-day to indict Belknap, but we must take steps afterward, when the trial comes off, to recover Marsh.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who ranks high as a lawyer in his own State, will oblige me by telling me if he ever knew of an indictment which failed to be pressed because of an apprehension that some of the witnesses might not be present when the case came up for trial two or three months afterward? I never heard of came up for trial two or three months afterward? I never heard of a grand jury that failed to indict a man because of fear that the witnesses might not appear at the trial.

Mr. LAMAR. I never did.
Mr. BLAINE. That is what he wants the House to do to-day. He wants the House to refuse to indict Belknap because when the case comes up for trial one of the witnesses may possibly not be present. Now, gentlemen, if you will unite with us in indicting Belknap, we will help you in our turn to get Marsh.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It was you who ran Marsh out of the country!

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Marsh went out with a safe-conduct from your committee. [Laughter.] And he left about fourteen hours before even these newspapers had manufactured a Cabinet meeting on the subject. He went, as I repeat, with the safe-conduct of that committee, and with enough United States money in his pocket to pay his way, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clymer] certified

Mr. CLYMER. The country will gladly pay him that money to recover all the money that has been stolen by your party during the last few years

Mr. BLAINE. The country would rather allow him twice the sum for staying than half for going.

Mr. CLYMER. He would have staid if you had not done or attempted to do what you are trying to do to every other witness before the investigating committees.

Mr. BLAINE. Then why do you not bring in a bill for his protection?

Mr. CLYMER. Two such bills have been introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Has that committee had the right to report since?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; at any time.
Mr. BLAINE. Not at any time.
Mr. BLAINE. Let them try it.
Mr. CLYMER. Do you mean to say that the committee has a right to report a bill for the protection of witnesses at any time?

Mr. BLAINE. The committee is not absolved from responsibility in not reporting a bill until they find that some person objects. you fear objection from this side of the House?

Mr. CLYMER. I am not a member of the Committee on the Judi-

Mr. BLAINE. Then why are you talking about it?
Mr. CLYMER. I spoke merely of the fact that two bills for that purpose have been introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

Mr. BLAINE. Are the Committee on the Judiciary ready to report?

Mr. CLYMER. I do not say that they are ready to report. But it is equally notorious that they have not reported and have not had an opportunity, under the rules of the House, to report.

opportunity, under the rules of the House, to report.

Mr. BLAINE. It is equally notorious that they have had five days to report and they have not reported.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of

Mr. HOPKINS. My point is that this scene is simply disgraceful because of the crowd, most of them not members, gathered in the area in front of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair listens to the suggestion and asks that order may be restored. The Chair understood the gen-and asks that order may be restored. The Chair understood the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. BLAINE. I am not raising any point of order. I want the country to understand this: it was Thursday evening last, at six o'clock, that the resolutions unanimously passed this House impeaching General Belknap. We understood that we might expect the articles of impeachment possibly the next day. Then there was some talk of having a session on Saturday for business, but it was devoted wholly to debate. Then Sunday intervened, and in the case of a great state emergency members of Congress sometimes work on Sunday. Then Monday came and went, and here is Tuesday at five o'clock p. m.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot yield just now. I say that up to this time there has been no report from the Committee on the Judiciary giving all possible immunity to witnesses either in general or to Marsh by name. There has been nothing initiated on that side, nothing proposed that indicates any desire or honest purpose to do that thing. And now to halt in regard to the trial of Belknap, or his presentation before the grand jury, because you say you have not got Marsh, and with all the power of this House in your hands you have not taken the first step to secure Marsh, not one, when every one knows you can

Mr. CLYMER. How?

Mr. BLAINE. Propose your bill. We do not mean to be hoodwinked about this matter. We do not mean that this matter shall be run alone by the democratic members of this committee. It is an open question to-day in this House, in which members as members, open question to-day in this House, in which members as members, republicans as well as democrats and democrats as well as republicans, have a right to be heard. We do not propose that any shuffling of that kind shall go before the people. You here to-day—I do not violate parliamentary law in saying it—under what is a pitiful evasion, deliberately withhold from the grand jury of the District of Columbia the sole and only evidence on which an indictment can be framed against this guilty officer. I want the country to understand that this is done, by whom it is done, and why it is done.

Mr. LAMAR obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentlemen yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?
Mr. LAMAR. For a few minutes, yes.
Mr. BEEBE. I understood the Chair to say he would recognize me.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair agreed to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] who introduced the resolution now before the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] subsequently applied to be heard.
Mr. LAMAR. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.
Mr. BEEBE. I want more than five minutes of the chair expanse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The occupant of the chair arranged with the gentleman from Mississippi that the gentleman from New York might be heard.

Mr. LAMAR. I will yield to the gentleman if I may be allowed to make a few remarks.

Mr. BEEBE. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi either

Mr. BEEBE. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi either now or when I shall have concluded.

Mr. LAMAR. I will go on now; I wish to make a few remarks and then I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cut this matter short and recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I will go on, and then before I give up the floor I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Beebe.]

Mr. KNOTT. Before the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] commences his remarks, will he allow me a few moments to vindicate myself and the committee with which I am associated?

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] took occasion in his remarks to express considerable anxiety to see the arti-

sion in his remarks to express considerable anxiety to see the articles of impeachment, as well as disappointment because they have not been reported, conveying the imputation that the Committee on the Judiciary had been perhaps derelict in their duty in preparing

Mr. BLAINE. I did not say they were "derelict."

Mr. KNOTT. I know the gentleman did not say "derelict;" but he repeated the insinuation that there was a purpose on the part of the committee in withholding from the House the articles of impeachment they were instructed to prepare. Permit me to say, sir, that after what passed between the gentleman from Maine and myself this morning, he is the last gentleman on this floor from whom I would have expected any such imputation.

Now, in justice to the Committee on the Judiciary I desire to say that in pursuance of the order of this House we at once entered upon this duty of preparing such articles of impeachment as we thought to be warranted by the testimony referred to us. It was something that could not be accomplished in an hour; it required several hours. Saturday, as every one knows, there was no business session of the On yesterday morning these articles were prepared and ready to be reported; but the committee being greatly pressed by business, and consequently compelled to hold a protracted session, having been granted leave to sit during the sessions of the House, they did not come upon the floor until after the House had gone into Committee of come upon the floor until after the House had gone into Committee of the Whole, which did not rise until quite late. They were still fully prepared to make their report this morning, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] well knew, before the expiration of the morning hour; and, as he well knows, they were furthermore prepared to report a bill for the protection of witnesses in cases of this kind, and which he expresses himself so ready to support; but immediately upon the expiration of the morning hour the floor was taken upon the pending question, which is one of the very highest privilege, and has been occupied by the present discussion ever since.

Now I ask the House at what time the Committee on the Judiciary has had an opportunity to make the report about which the gentleman seems so anxious, and which has been prepared ever since yes-terday morning, and ready to be submitted. I appeal to the gentle-man from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. man from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Lawrence,] the gentleman's own political associates, to verify what I have said. There has been no disposition whatever on the part of the Judiciary Committee to delay. They have gone to work honestly and in good faith to do their duty as instructed by the House.

Mr. HOAR. In reply to the appeal of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Knott,] I would merely remark that what he says is quite true. He forgets, however, that his side of the House adjourned the House yesterday against the remonstrance of all the republicans present.

Mr. KNOTT. Well, the Judiciary Committee had nothing to do with that.

Mr. LAMAR. I cannot yield any longer.
Mr. KNOTT. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for the opportunity to make this brief explanation.

Mr. LAMAR. I have been very generous in yielding to interrup-

Mr. LAMAR. I have been very generous in yielding to interruptions. I cannot yield further.

Mr. Speaker, I propose now to bring back this discussion to the legitimate limit to which it should have been confined during the progress of the debate. What are the facts of this case? A committee regularly appointed by the Speaker of the House under its order proceeds with an investigation, which results in charging against a Cabinet officer the crime of malversation in office, accepting bribes for the bestowal of offices within his gift. Pending these proceedings, a criminal judge, an appointee of the executive department of the Government, issues a mandate to members of that committee ordering them, not "inviting" them, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] states; not making a polite request, but ordering the members of that states; not making a polite request, but ordering the members of that committee to bring into that court all the papers, all the contracts, all the testimony in its possession touching this charge against this former Cabinet officer.

Mr. FORT. It is a subpœna in the usual form.
Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir, the subpœna is in the usual form; and that is the objection to it. Now the question arises whether or not it was proper for the gentlemen who are thus subpensed to bring be-

was proper for the gentlemen who are thus subpensed to bring before the court the papers in their custody, to obey that summons or to come before this House for instructions. There is no other question; and all this debate, with all the passion that has been flung in here, is irrelevant, and simply tends to convert a pure question of constitutional and parliamentary law into an idle logomachy; a war of words and of passion which can but obscure the issue.

The gentleman from Maine, as soon as these gentlemen modestly, temperately, and properly make their report to the House, says here in debate that he cannot see where the "delicacy" about their action should come in. Upon their report I introduce a resolution expressive of the opinion that this mandate of the court calling upon these members of the House and members of the committee—not individuals who have seen a crime committed, the case with which the gentleman from Maine has tried to analogize it—but these members of a committee, as such, to bring before the court the official proceedings of this body in that committee-room. Now, I ask whether that was not a breach of the privileges of this House in the person of its members?

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] who never expresses any opinion differing from my own upon law or the Constitution without my feeling more like revising my own opinion than correcting his, rose in his place after reflection upon the subject and not only stated that these gentlemen did right in coming here and asking the action of the House, but that they did wrong in going before that court and asking it to suspend its action until they could get the instruction of the House

The gentleman will allow me to explain. I said that in waiving their privilege they did wrong. That is it.

Mr. LAMAR. I understand it; and without complaining at all of the gentleman's interruption, I hope he will not correct me again, because I do not think I have misstated his position.

Mr. HOAR. I thought you did.
Mr. LAMAR. The waiving of the privilege was the reason the gentleman gave; but the fact that they did wrong in going before that court is the statement which he made; he regarded it as a contempt of the House.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman will allow me I can explain the matter in six words. The committee themselves said, as I understood them, that they waived their privilege. I said that if they did they did wrong.

Mr. LAMAR. O, yes; if they did.

Mr. HOAR. And they said they did.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. They only waived their privilege so far as to appear before the court and make their statement.

Mr. LAMAR. For the purposes of truth—and I know the gentlement from Massachusetts has no other purpose in these interruptions man from Massachusetts has no other purpose in these interruptions—for the purposes of truth, I am willing for all these explanations to come in. The position is that if these gentlemen did waive their privilege, they committed a contempt of this House. But suppose privilege, they committed a contempt of this House. But suppose they waived no privilege, but only went before the court and informed it that they intended first to take the instruction of this House before they responded to the summons. The gentleman must see that in this case there is no waiver of privilege, either express or implied, but the privilege is reserved subject to the instruction and authority of the House.

Then what sing I have forward with a resolution which states all.

Then what, sir ? I came forward with a resolution which states all the circumstances and then simply asserts the jurisdiction of this House over the subject-matter, over the person, over the papers in this great impeachment trial, the most august and imposing trial known to the Constitution and laws of our country, in the presence of which these passions, these thoughts about presidential succession which these passions, these thoughts about presidental succession and party triumph actually, sir, fatigue my contempt.

What, sir, is the purport of my resolution? Simply to assert the authority of this House. What else? To tell those members not to regard that summons until its further order. Gentlemen say that it is suppression of the prosecution and of the testimony. No, sir; it is simply to protect the jurisdiction to which we are entitled and which, simply to protect the jurisdiction to which we are entitled and which, I undertake to say, has been invaded by this court. If a precedent is established, if it is allowable for members of our committees to be detailed without coming and seeking the instructions of this House to go before that court, you may at once dismiss all your investigating committees. As I illustrated it before, matters proceeding in this court are now the subject of investigation. Has it the right, and is it trifling, is it skulking, for this House to assert at once its authority that these members shall not go before that court with transactions which occurred in its committee until the further order of the House? which occurred in its committee until the further order of the House? The House does not refuse the testimony. It does not refuse to allow testimony; but it does call upon members of that committee that the summons shall be disregarded until it orders otherwise.

And, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoan] sustains me. What is it, he says, these gentlemen were guilty of? Of contempt in going there and offering to testify, and he proposes the action of this House to authorize them to go and testify? Now, if it is not trifling with the dignity and privileges of this House to authorize members to go and testify before that court, how can it be trifling with its dignity aimply for this House to are precisely on the extra precisely of the extra precisely with its dignity simply for this House to act precisely on the other line, and say you shall not go there without our order?

What is the case before the House? It is not a case of personal privilege; it is not a case whether members can waive their personal privilege and go there, but simply whether this House shall exercise its unquestioned and unquestionable authority of restraining them from waiving their privileges as members. It is the privilege of this House, that body in the connected chain of linked responsibilities from the President down which holds all the other Departments of the Government responsible to it, invested with the partments of the Government responsible to it, invested with the authority of examining, criticizing, and impeaching them? If this subpœna was recognized, recognized, sir; if the members had done the thing which the gentleman from Maine seemed to think they ought to have done, it would have been competent for that court, if they had disobeyed, to punish them with personal attachment. I am ready here to take the responsibility of meeting this thing in limine. These papers, this evidence, this testimony, are in the possession of this House through its committee; it has exclusive control and custody of them; and if it allows a judicial tribunal to take them from its control, you are dispossessed of them, and that too while this impeachment trial may be going on.

Now another point. William W. Belknap is in the custody of this House, sir. He is undergoing trial.

House, sir. He is undergoing trial.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman—

Mr. LAMAR. Wait until I get through my sentence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi declines to be interrupted, and the gentleman from Maine will observe

Mr. LAMAR. I repeat, sir, he is in the legal custody of this House, under its constitutional control. If the gentleman from Maine means to say we have not the bodily possession of him by arrest, so be it; but we have got control of him.

Mr. BLAINE. We never intended to arrest him.
Mr. LAMAR. We may arrest him, and will do it if it is necessary, and can do it. Do you deny our competency?
Mr. BLAINE. Undoubtedly in an impeachment; I deny it, and and can do it.

Mr. LAMAR. You also said it was absurd to say there was anything punishable in an impeachment; and when my friend from Tennesseee, [Mr. Bright,] the distinguished gentleman from that State, spoke of two concurring jurisdictions, one having already acquired it by initiating the proceeding it could not be ousted, the gentleman inflicted upon him that most terrible of all punishments, the forfeiture of his respect for him as an attorney. [Laughter.] I trust the gentleman will survive, and, in full view of that penalty myself, I assert, sir, it is true, and that an impeachment is a penal trial.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the gentleman takes the ground that the man could be twice punished for the same offense? I say that impeachment is protective and that the criminal jurisdiction is punitive. That is what I say, and I go on to say further that there never has been an impeachment in the United States in which there was any attempt to possess the body because of the impeachment. The possession of the body is of no account in impeachment. The judgment session of the body is of no account in impeachment. The judgment which deprives the man of the right to hold office is just as effective if the man were absent as in the case of his being present; and there never was an arrest of a man for impeachment in this country.

Mr. LAMAR. Are you sure of that? Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. LAMAR. Mr. BLAINE. Yes, Sir.

Mr. LAMAR. Then let us form this issue, plain and complete.

The gentleman says there cannot be two punishments inflicted on an individual for the same offense. The same offense. Here is the Constitution, which says that the officer shall not only be removed from office on impeachment and disqualified to hold office thereafter, but that he shall be subject to indictment, conviction, and punishment by a jury besides.

Now, sir, there is the Constitution. That answers the question of the gentleman. And I am afraid that the gentleman will lose his respect for the Constitution when it responds to his question, by saying that a man guilty of an impeachable offense shall be punished not only by removal from office, not only by disqualification to hold office, but also by indictment, conviction, and punishment.
Mr. BLAINE. Read it. Read it from the Constitution.
Mr. LAMAR. Here it is, sir.

Judgment-

Mr. BLAINE. "Judgment," not "punishment." Go on. [Laughter on the democratic side of the House.]
Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman's oracular wisdom calls forth a laugh. Before we are through the laughter will be at him instead of with him. The gentleman says "judgment," and wishes me to explain the word 'judgment."

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Is not that one punishment?

Mr. BLAINE. Punishment is not mentioned there. Now, read on.

Mr. LAMAR. You say that is not a punishment?

Mr. BLAINE. Go on.
Mr. LAMAR. I put the question to the gentleman because of his interruption. Is not removal from office and disqualification to hold office a punishment?

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman speaks of its being a moral pun-

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir.
Mr. BLAINE. If he speaks of its being a moral punishment, he may be right; but a legal punishment it is not.
Mr. LAMAR. I ask the gentleman, not whether it is a moral punishment or not, but is it not a legal punishment?
Mr. BLAINE. It is not.
Mr. LAMAR. Then the gentleman says that a removal from office, a discussification to hold office, while a moral retribution or something a disqualification to hold office, while a moral retribution or something of that kind, is not, in the contemplation of the law and the Consti-tution, a penalty, a legal punishment. Very well. Mr. BLAINE. Now read the next part.

Mr. LAMAR. I am coming to the next part. That is one thing.

Then this provision of the Constitution goes on to say:

But the party convicted-

What, sir? "The party convicted?" It is not "judgment" this time. It is conviction. And what is conviction, sir, but the judgment in a penal trial? Very well. I will carry you further directly.

But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

Now notice this language again. Perhaps I can convince the gen-

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Very well. Now, sir, the gentleman says that that is no punishment, and that the only punishment in the eye of the law is that which this provision speaks of in the second clause. I have too much which this provision speaks of in the second clause. I have too much respect for him as a lawyer to tell him that he is under a mistake on that point; but there are men who hold a different opinion on that. May I have the attention of the gentleman and of his admiring acclaimers and applauders to the authority which is almost as high upon questions of constitutional law as himself? I read from Wallace's Supreme Court reports. Now notice. The court is speaking of certain constitutional disabilities imposed, and uses this language:

The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment.

Mr. BLAINE. "May be# Mr. LAMAR. Well, you are nearly run to the ground. The gentleman has got to the "may be." Well, I suppose his position is this: that the removal from office and perpetual disqualification from office thereafter "may be" a punishment. But whether it may be or not, the officer impeached shall "nevertheless" be liable to indictment, conviction, and punishment according to law. I have got him to the "may be" now. He said a moment ago it was not so. Now he injects an interruption, and says "it may be a punishment." That is promising. Perhaps I can lead him on a little further. [Applause.]

Disqualification from office may be punishment as in ca

I have a great mind, sir, to let my friend off.
What do you say, gentlemen? Shall I go on? [Cries of "Go on,"
"Punish him."]

Disqualification from office may be punishment as in cases of conviction upon differentment.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me state what I mean. The gentleman read the opinion of the Supreme Court which said that disability may be punishment. Well, that is just as gentlemen take it. The gentleman from Mississippi did take it as a punishment, but another gentleman from Mississippi, Jeff. Davis, regards it as no punishment. [Cries of "O!" "O!" on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. LAMAR. "May be punishment." Does the gentleman mean to say it is punishment or not as the recipient considers it? Is that what this decision means? Well, sir, let us see what it says: it says that disqualification from office may be punishment as in cases of conviction of impeachment. It may not be punishment in other cases, but it is in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Note the language of the court:

The disabilities created by the constitution of Missouri must be regarded as penalties; they constitute Punishment. We do not agree with the counsel of Missouri, that "to punish one is to deprive him of life, liberty, or property, and that to take from him anything less than these is no punishment at all." The learned counsel does not use these terms—life, liberty, and property—as comprehending every right known to the law. He does not include under liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings as well as restraints on the person. He does not include under property those estates which one may acquire in professions, though they are often the source of the highest emoluments and honors. The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment, the circumstances at tending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office may be punishment, as in cases of conviction upon impeaclment.

Now, sir, here is this trial going on, the trial of a former Secretary of War. The process of impeachment is not complete. All of the testimony has not been collected, and that which has been collected testimony has not been collected, and that which has been collected has been rendered useless by an accident or anything you may choose to call it. But, sir, while that grand trial is going on, here comes a small criminal court ordering the committee to come before them. What for? To bring with them all the papers in their possession to impeach and to try this man, William W. Belknap. It was not my purpose to go into that question, but I will do it for an instant.

Mr. Speaker, there was not a particle of testimony before that committee, or before it now, on which an indictment against W. W. Belknap, or he founded. I say it as a lawyer. I repeat that as against mittee, or before it now, on which an indictment against W. W. Belknap can be founded. I say it as a lawyer. I repeat that as against William W. Belknap there is not any evidence or any testimony or anything on which any grand jury can base an indictment against W. W. Belknap. There are papers there which taken in connection with the testimony of Mr. Marsh might do it. But, sir, there is another fact to which I invoke the attention of my friends on this (the republican) side of the House, for whom I have the kindliest feeling; and inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has referred to it. I will state here that toward the republican party of the country to it, I will state here that toward the republican party of the country I have no personal animosity or ill feeling. I am indebted to that party for the right of standing here on this floor to-day as a Representative in part of my State; and I say that it was an act of magnanimity on their part to extend to me that privilege, whatever may be my opinion as to the wrong done me and my people in imposing these disabilities upon us. Viewing it from your stand-point, it was a magnanimous set a magnanimous act.

Therefore, sir, gentlemen of both parties, I proclaim to you, and I do it as a lawyer, that there is not only no testimony before this committee on which a criminal court could indict or convict W. W. Belmittee on which a criminal court could indict or convict W. W. Belknap, but there is testimony there upon which Marsh could be indicted, and nobody else but Marsh. Now, gentlemen, we have all the proceedings which have been taken in this House and all the testimony which has been brought before it against W. W. Belknap; but with Marsh absent it is useless, and there is no way of criminally proceeding against W. W. Belknap. The only effect will be to indict, try, and convict Marsh, the confessed accomplice, who gave his testimony against Belknap. Sir, the question is whether we shall permit this testimony to go, or hold it until, in the discretion of this House, the members of the investigating committee shall be ordered to go before that court and testify.

I believe there is no republican on this floor who has any disposition to screen this distinguished general who has recently been exposed in this terrible crime. The calamity is so great, the hideous ruin into which he has fallen is such as to make him sacred from attack, and all that we can do is to let the law take its course, feeling no sentiment of indignation against the unhappy man, no sentiment other than that of commiseration; but in the mean time it behooves the House of Representatives, and I invoke its action to-day, to see to it that its constitutional rights and its powers are respected.* [Applewed] plause.]

I now call the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman understands my amendment to be

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman understands my amendment to be pending.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the gentleman sits down—
Mr. LAMAR. I have yielded to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEEBE. For the insinuations of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] I pity him from the bottom of my heart. However much I may suffer in my reputation before the country as a wit, I know that the gentleman will suffer tenfold more for his reputation as a lawyer, if not as an honest statesman.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BEEBE. Certainly. Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to bring to the attention of the House

Mr. WHITHORNE. I desire to bring to the attention of the House right now and at this moment a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would snggest that the House is now considering a question of privilege.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, and the question I wish to bring up is involved in this discussion. I have to state to the House that by order of the Committee on Naval Affairs a witness whom we regard the being controlled to the House that the being the province of the committee on the House that the leaves of the committee of the House that the leaves of the committee of the House that the leaves of the committee of the House that the leaves of the lea to be in contempt of the House is now in custody of an officer of the House. Looking to what has been said about the action of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and the reflections made upon them, and the point being made against them, the Committee on Naval Affairs runs some peril before the country unless immediate action is taken worn this ages. mediate action is taken upon this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that by unanimous consent this question might be laid aside for a time.

Mr. BEEBE. I will not detain the House many minutes. mittee on Naval Affairs is abundantly competent for the detention of their witnes

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. Beebe] will permit him, that immediately upon the disposition of this subject the Chair will recognize the gen-upon the disposition of this subject the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BEEBE. That recusant witness ought not to be entirely without the sympathy of this House, for he is between two fires; the executive on the one side and the legislative on the other.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, permit me to say that our Committee on Expenditures in the War Department are not liable to any censure; that they would have been liable to censure, amenable to punishment, or at least to an expression of disapprobation and indignation by this House, had they taken any other course than that which they have taken. Why would they have become so liable at this time? Because Robert C. Schenck gave them a recent lesson about questions of privilege. Mr. Schenck, as minister to England, knew enough to avail himself of his privilege to get out of the British realm, and the President did not accept the resignation until British realm, and the President did not accept the resignation until after Bob Schenck had left.

Now, had this committee gone before that tribunal and surrendered the testimony in its charge or keeping, whether it had absolutely surrendered or not the documents in their charge, had it revealed evidence before that committee, they would have been severely censured by this House. Why? Because the Federal courts here, animated by the central spirit of Washington, have taught us that they are not safe depositories for testimony against criminals.

Attorney-General upon a recent occasion for the purpose of shielding a man then on trial in Saint Louis for a high crime. Mr. Pierrepont is reported as saying, in explanation more fully of his famous letter, that it was made public through General Babcock. Who was he? A man having access to the papers of the Attorney-General. How? As quasi private secretary of the President of the United States.

Now, shall this legislative department of the Government run wildly about the country seeking such safe repositories as are the Federal courts, the courts here at Washington? Why, sir, let me remind gentlemen on the other side of the House of a little matter of history which I at least have not forgotten, if they have. That tribunal has been invoked before. Gentlemen have referred to Jeff.

* After I concluded my remarks, Mr. Sampson, of Iowa, came to my seat and called my attention to the statute of 1861, under which the testimony given by a witness in an investigation of this kind before a committee of the House is forbidden to be used in any criminal proceeding against him. Having in the hurry of off-hand debate, overlooked that statute, I think I overstated the liability of Marsh to be indicted on the evidence before the committee exclusive of his own depositions.

Davis here, an obscure character of which we have heard somewhat of late. Let me refer gentlemen, especially an honorable gentleman on the other side of the House, my colleague from New York, [Mr. Townsend,] who was so afraid when southern heads were shaken at him, that he had to conjure up the ghost of Preston Brooks—has he forgotten how aman walked from the presidential mansion down into the editorial sanctum of a newspaper here, and, not finding the responsible editor there, beset and belabored an old man whose head is white as the head of my colleague: invaded the private sanctum responsible editor there, beset and belabored an old man whose head is white as the head of my colleague; invaded the private sanctum of that editorial office? And having done this, he walked with brazen impudence through the streets of Washington back to the Executive Mansion. And justice was appeased in that case. He was dragged before this terrible District tribunal. Let it be handed down to posterity, for the benefit of the reputation of the American people, that the law was vindicated, and the presidential brother-in-law was that the law was vindicated, and the presidential brother-in-law was fined $100.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. He was a democrat, was he not?

Mr. BEEBE. He was just such a democrat as Belknap is, and as is the President who said he never voted but one ticket, and that was for James Buchanan. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not wonder that there is agitation on the other side of the Charles.

Now, I do not wonder that there is agree to be the other side of the Chamber. For years and years the nation has been laboring under a load imposed upon it, not by the necessities of the country, but by the rapacity of thieves in office. The people have arraigned that administration of affairs which has for years been maintained throughout the Departments of the Federal Government; and they have sent out the Departments of the Federal Government; and they have sent here what in the language of the republicans we were wont to hear characterized a few years ago as the "grand inquest of the nation." Here to this Hall, where they are wont to repose all their power, they have sent a majority peculiarly and especially commissioned to search out fraud and punish criminals. They have begun their duty, and only just begun. Let the consequences fall where they may, they are determined to pursue that duty until they shall have accomplished all within their power to accomplish.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House may tell us of the escape of a miserable Marsh, an obscure petty thief. The democracy were so intent upon greater things that this miserable offender may perhaps have slipped through their fingers by the aid of the deliberations and determinations of an executive cabinet council. But we tions and determinations of an executive cabinet council. But we propose to pursue, not especially the Marshes, who are but the trichina; we propose to take hold of those villains who in high places have been betraying the most holy trusts. The gentleman from Maine may go about with his lighted candle seeking for Marsh. Why, sir, he reminds me of the lines of the western rhymster:

Some bait their hooks with mites of cheese, And sit on a kennel and bob for fleas: Some bait their hooks with tigers' tails, And sit on a rock and bob for whales.

Gentlemen on the other side may pursue their flea-catching business as assiduously as they please; we will drag from these turbid waters of pollution the great thieves, the whales. We will supplement it, if need be, by dragging forth the leviathan himself, to the indignation and punishment of an outraged people.

Mr. LAMAR. I now demand the previous question. I meant to do it at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Lamar.] When he requested me to yield, did he do so with the intention of taking the floor from me?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir, not at all. I thought the gentleman was through. I beg his pardon. I hope he will proceed. I do not wish to put any limit upon him.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. Will the gentleman allow me to put a single

Mr. BEEBE. I would prefer not to yield now.
Mr. MacDOUGALL. Does not the gentleman know that the man whom he accuses of going down to a newspaper office and caning an inoffensive editor had just previously been the democratic candidate for governor of Mississippi ?

for governor of Mississippi f

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker, it has always been the privilege of the "galled jade" to wince; and I regret that the rules of the House interpose a barrier here. But the rules must be maintained.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You should not abuse your democratic candidate for governor of Mississippi because he caned a man.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL.) The gentleman from New York knows perfectly well that he is out of order; and the Chair hopes he is old enough to regard this admonition. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to say but a word or two in conclusion. This committee, as I have maintained from the start, did right in all its steps. It did right to go down and plead its privilege as it did, saying that it held that privilege subject to the authority of the House; that it would come back and report to the House that a criminal tribunal of the country had sent a subpæna to members of the committee, and of the country had sent a subpena to members of the committee, and would let the House take such action as it might deem proper. I hold that the committee did right in this, and I hope the House will in the most emphatic manner so declare. I hope, too, that the House will sustain the Naval Committee in the request they are about to present. I trust that such further action may be taken as will say to men who have fatal secrets in their keeping, "If in the interest of reform, in the interest of purging the Government from the rapacity and the corruption which have crept into its various departments, you will come forward and place those secrets in the keeping of the people of the United States represented here in their House of Rep-people of the United States represented here in their House of Representatives, you shall be protected by the House."

I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this debate, and I certainly have no intention to say anything which shall provoke its continuance. But I think it is due to the gentlemen composing the committees of the House, who have approximate the Universe of the House of pealed to the House for guidance and counsel in reference to this sub-poena from this judicial tribunal, that the House should respond to their demand.

It was well said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Black-BURN] that this is not a question simply of personal privilege, but a question of the privilege of the House, and it is altogether unlike the case suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] where a party sees a murder committed and is subpensed to testify before a court in reference to that transaction, and he cannot refuse on the ground that it would be an infringement of the privilege of the House. This is entirely unlike that case. There it is not a question of personal privilege. But the question is, Shall the members of the committee obey this subpœna and transfer all the evidence in the impeachment trial to a foreign jurisdiction?

I am sure when the House looks at the extraordinary document is sued from this court of justice they will at once see the appeal which the members of the committee have made to the House is not to reand protect the right and privileges of the House to hold its own papers, its own documents, its own records in its own possession. Sir, it is a singular document and reads in this way:

The President of the United States to Hester Clymer to bring all papers, documents, records, checks, contracts in your possession or in the possession of the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department, in relation to the charge against said defendant of accepting a bribe or bribes while Secretary of War of the United States.

You are hereby commanded to attend the said court immediately, to testify on behalf of the United States, and not depart the court without leave of the court or the district attorney.

This is the extraordinary document which has been served on the members of this committee. It demands the contract. What contract? Prime among the papers, chief among the testimony before this committee, is the fraudulent contract between Marsh and Evans. It is the foundation of the impeachment against Belknap, late Secretary of War. What other papers there may be are also required to be produced, consisting of the report and the exhibits attached to the report of the committee. Are all these to be taken by the process of this criminal court? Are they to be taken out of the possession of this crimmal court? Are they to be taken out of the possession of the House and put into the possession of the criminal court? This would be to lose possession of the very evidence upon which your managers are to conduct the impeachment.

It has been well said by my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] that if all the papers were laid before the most learned judicial tribunal in the land they would not constitute evidence of the property of t dence sufficient to predicate an indictment or successfully maintain an indictment against Belknap, late Secretary of War; though they might, and in all probability would, be sufficient to find and maintain might, and in all probability would, be sufficient to find and maintain an indictment against the witness Marsh. The testimony of the committee or any member of it would only be hearsay.

Sir, the idea was that the members of the committee should take from the custody of this House, under this subpana duces tecum and bring before that court all the documents, all the papers, all the records which went to criminate the late Secretary of War and maintain the impeachment. Suppose that was done, what security has the House that these documents which are the basis of the impeachment, mon which this most extraordinary trial is to proceed—what security upon which this most extraordinary trial is to proceed—what security has it those papers will ever be returned to its custody once they go out of the custody of the committee, out of the control of the House, and into the possession of officers over whom the House possesses no control whatever?

I thought, sir, there was a peculiar propriety in these gentlemen, thus subprenaed by this extraordinary process, appealing to the House to protect them from surrendering that which, indeed, they had no control over. When the report of that committee had been made, when its documents, proofs, evidence, and records accompanying that report were submitted to the House, they were the records, proofs, and documents of the House, and not of the committee, and they possessed no power to surrender them, even if they desired to do so.

I stated, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my purpose to prolong this debate; but it seems to me, when you look at the peculiar character of this subpœna and the evident purpose to take from the House the conduct of this matter in reference to the grave impeachment impending now or which will be in a day or two in the other branch of the national Legislature, it is a proposition which has been well charthe hatonal Legislature, it is a proposition which has been wen characterized as transferring to a police court or justice's court all the documents, all the records, and all the evidence which pertain to this extraordinary trial. And now, having said this much, I will not trespass further upon the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois—
Mr. LAMAR. I now demand the previous question.
Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOAR. It is understood, I believe, that the gentleman from Mississippi allowed my amendment to come in, and that in case the previous question was seconded it would be voted on as a substitute for his proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is pending in the nature of a substitute.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a question of privilege. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to submit a report in part. The report was read as follows:

The report was read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, who were charged under a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted January 14, 1876, with the duty of making inquiry into any errors, abuses, or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting the naval service, and who, by said resolution, in order to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of the Government were authorized inquiries to make for such periods in the past as said committee might deem necessary for its own guidance or information, or for the protection of the public interests, in exposing frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in said Departments; and were also authorized by said resolution to send for persons and papers, submit, in part, the following report:

That in pursuance of the power conferred upon them by the House, they caused one Alcaeus B. Wolfe, of Washington City, to be summoned before them for the purpose of giving testimony; who appeared this the 7th day of March, 1876, and, after being duly sworn, did testify as follows:

ALCAEUS B. WOLFE sworn.

By the CHAIRMAN:

By the CHAIRMAN:
Question. Where do you reside ?
Answer. In this city.
Q. How long have you resided here?
A. Since the early part of September, 1861.
Q. Were you ever employed as clerk or book-keeper of Mr. S. P. Brown?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. During what year?
A. From the middle of January, 1867, until August, 1874.
Q. You were then in his employ in April, 1872?
A. Yes, sir; I was in the employ of S. P. and A. B. Brown. The firm was S. P. Brown & Son, Q. Were you summoned as a witness to appear before a House committee during that time?

that time?

A. Not to my knowledge. I was taken with pneumonia about that time, and was oil I I could not leave my room, and in fact could not be interviewed even by any one. There was no summons sent to me at that time to my knowledge.

Q. You are aware that at that time the connection of S. P. Brown with the "Governor" claim was being investigated?

A. Yes, sir. I know there was such a claim, but my recollection will not make me fix the exact date. I know he was connected with that claim.

Q. You were not examined before the committee at that time?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you any recollection as to the time and circumstances connected with the payment of that claim and the receipt of any money by Mr. Brown?

- A. I have a recollection that he received a fee for his services in prosecuting that claim.

  Q. Were you present at the time he received the fee?

  A. I was not present when he received it.

  Q. Where were you?

  A. I was in the office. Mr. Brown and another gentleman—I think it was General Hosmer, I will not be positive—went into the rear office, which was divided from the front room by a dark glass. How much was divided there I cannot say.

  Q. Was anybody else there in the room beside General Hosmer and Mr. Brown?

  A. Yes, sir; but I will not say who the other gentleman was, for I do not know.

  Q. Was it not Mr. Cattell?

  A. I do not know his first name. He is a short, heavy-built gentleman; I have often seen him in Mr. Brown?s office. It is Ex-Senator Cattell. The three went in there. I do not know that the money was divided now, but Brown went in there and the money was taken in; but what was done with it I do not know, because the door was closed and I could not see through the glass, which was ground.

  Q. How much money was taken in there?

  A. Mr. Brown gave an order to the Hampshire and Baltimore Coal Company, to whom he was indebted for a note or on open account, for $500 I think, and that amount was deducted. Paymaster Stewart, of the Navy, was the one who paid the claim. He made two checks, one for $500 to this coal company, and the other to go to——. I do not know in what name it was drawn, because I did not see the check.

  Q. Have you as book-keeper any knowledge of what that amount was?

  A. That was not put upon the books.

  Q. Was any memorandum of that transaction put upon the books at all?

  A. No, sir. I may have given Mr. S. P. Brown on the books credit for the amount he put into the cash; that was all. There was no memorandum of the entire transaction put on the books.

  Q. Have you any recollection that you did put such an amount upon the books?

  A. No, sir; I have not.

  Q. Have you any recollection of the connection of Simeon Johnson with the transaction?

  A. Simeon Johnson was interested in that

- A. Simeon Johnson was interested in that affair, but to what extent I could not

- say.
  Q. Was not a part of that money paid to Simeon Johnson?
  A. I could not say, for I did not see it paid.
  Q. Did the books furnish you any knowledge that he received any part of it?
  A. No, sir.

  - By Mr. MILLS:
- Q. Did you ever hear Simeon Johnson say he ever received a of it?
  A. No, sir; Mr. Johnson would not do that.
  Q. Who was with you in the front room when this transaction took place?
  A. I do not remember. There were three clerks, and one or another might be

- Ot. Was Mr. Butler present?

  A. He might have been; I would not say whether he was or was not.

  Q. Do you remember that one of those clerks called your attention to what was going on in the other room?

  A. I do not remember that he did, but I remember he afterward told me that he did, and I told him that I did not remember it.

  Q. Do you remember making any remark to either one of the clerks about the transaction that was then going on?

  A. I might have; I would not be positive.

  Q. Did not you know that a division was taking place in that back room?

  A. I did not; but I believed it.

  Q. Upon what is your belief founded?

  A. Upon the fact that they went in there with the money, and they all walked out feeling very well. That is just what I based it on; but I had no positive knowledge.

- A. Upon the fact that they went in there with the money, and they all walked out feeling very well. That is just what I based it on; but I had no positive knowledge.

  Q. Do you not know that Mr. S. P. Brown got $18,200, or about that amount, which was passed to his credit, made a deposit, or in some way?

  A. I do not know the amount.

  Q. Did he deposit or pass any money to his credit?

  A. On several occasions when Mr. Brown has obtained a fee for procuring the payment of claims he took the money and made a special deposit in the Safe-Deposit Company in this way: The money was handed in to them in an envelope with his name on it only. He had a great many judgments against him, and he did this to avoid having the money attached. They did not know what was in the envelopes, and I did not know what amounts he put in there.

  Q. Immediately after these parties came out, do you know that he made such a deposit as that?

  A. I would not say that he did or did not.

  Q. Have you any knowledge?

  A. I have no recollection. Four years ago is rather more than I would carry in my memory, for it was an every-day transaction you may almost say. He would take his money, lay it in there, and would not put it into the bank for fear it would be attached. He would just take it over there, and then give me a note, and I would go over and get the money.

  Q. Did you ever take any money by direction of Mr. Brown and hand it to any-body connected with the naval service?

  A. I decline to answer that question.

  Q. Do you know the peril you are likely to incur in refusing to answer?

  A. Yes, sir; I came expecting it.

  Q. Have you been asked not to appear?

  A. No, sir.

  Q. Have you been asked not to appear?

  A. No, sir.

  Q. What has been said to you by anybody about appearing as a witness before this committee?

  A. Nothing whatever, sir, that I can remember, before this committee.

- this committee ?

- this committee?

  A. Nothing whatever, sir, that I can remember, before this committee.
  Q. Or before the committee four years ago?

  A. No, sir.
  Q. Was no effort made by persuasion or otherwise to induce you not to appear?

  A. No, sir; not by any human being.
  Q. Do you know of any commissions or payments being in any way made to any person connected with the naval service by any contractor or claim agent?

  The WITNESS. With what purpose; for furthering their interests?

- The CHARMAN. Yes, sir.

  The WITNESS. I decline to answer that question.

  At the request of the witness he was then allowed to leave the committee-room for a short time in the custody of an officer of the House to transact some private business. Upon his return the examination continued.
  - By the CHAIRMAN:
- Q. Have you reflected upon your duty to answer the questions propounded to you

- A. I could not answer those questions, Q. I repeat them to you specifically by direction of the committee. The first was:
  "Did you ever take any money by direction of Mr. Brown and hand it to anybody connected with the naval service?" Your answer was, "I decline to answer that
- question."
  The Witness. Will you please specify which Mr. Brown?
  The CHAIRMAN. Either one.
  The Witness. I cannot answer the question.

By the Chairman:

- Q. "Do you know of any commissions or payments being in any way made to any person connected with the naval service?"

  A. I decline to answer that question.
  Q. Do you decline to answer for any reason personal to yourself?
  A. Not that I have any personal interest in it, sir; that is, not a monetary interest.

- A. Not that I have any personal interest in it, sir; that is, not a monetary interest.

  Q. You are aware probably that under the law one is not bound to criminate himself; is that your reason for declining to answer?

  A. No, sir. I will state this, that I never received at any one time a dollar for anything that Mr. Brown may have paid without my knowledge or with my knowledge to any man. I do not wish that to be interpreted that I know that he did pay anything.

  Q. Mr. S. P. Brown and A. Z. Brown are contractors with the Navy Department, are they not or have been?

  A. They were at one time in partnership as contractors. Since then they have dissolved partnership and each one contracts individually as far as I know. They carry on business under different licenses, and I presume carry it on separately; but at the time you refer to they were partners.

  Q. And were acting as claim agents?

  A. The old gentleman did more of the claim agency business than the young man did. The latter attended more to the lumber business; but they acted together in a great many cases.

  Mr. WHITTHORNE. By the direction of the Committee on Naval
- Mr. WHITTHORNE. By the direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I am instructed to ask of the House the adoption of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk. In asking it, allow me to say that it was done with the hearty co-operation of every member of the committee who was present, including members of both political parties, and I ask the previous question on the passage of the order.
  - The Clerk read the order, as follows:
- Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Alcaens B. Wolfe, and him bring to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the mean time keep the said Wolfe in custody to await the further orders of the House.
- The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;
- and under the operation thereof the order was agreed to.

  Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
  - The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. SEELYE to withdraw from the files of the House the papers accompanying the bill (H. R. No. 942) for the relief of Thomas Madden, reported adversely by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. John REILLY for three days on important business; and to Mr. Gause for twenty days.

And then, on motion of Mr. Cox, (at seven o'clock and five minutes

p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

- The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

  By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Henry Breckman, for pay and allowance as first lieutenant Forty-seventh Regiment Ohio Infantry,
- by Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Illinois, that the present duty on linseed and linseed oil may be maintained, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

  By Mr. COCHRAN: The petition of citizens of Allegheny County,
- Pennsylvania, that the present duty on foreign coal may not be re
- moved, to the same committee.

  By Mr. COX: Memorial of William G. Douglas, for a new departure in finance, and giving a plan of his own, to the same committee.

  By Mr. DURAND: The petition of G. D. Somers and 50 other citizens of Ovid, Michigan, for the repeal of the resumption act, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

  By Mr. HARTRIDGE: Memorial of citizens of Bullock County, Covering for the orthlightness of a reset tente for Educate Source.
- Georgia, for the establishment of a post-route from Eden to Samuel E. Groover's, Bullock County, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

  By Mr. HENDEE: Memorial of Edgar H. Bates, for compensation for expenses incurred in the burial of his son, killed at the time of the - destruction of the Northern Liberty Market in Washington, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

  By Mr. HENKLE: The petition of John E. O'Donnell, for relief, to the Committee of Claims.

  By Mr. HEWITT, of New York: The petition of James Traynor, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

  By Mr. JENKS: Memorial of Mary McLain, for an increase of pension to the some committee.
- sion, to the same committee.
- By Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut: The petition of John L. Bullard and 45 others, for the repeat of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. McDILL: The petition of James Eveleth, for compensation as disbursing agent for Washington, and as agent of the Engineer Department, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

neer Department, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORGAN: The petition of G. W. Thompson and others, of Webster County, Missouri, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. NORTON: The petition of James Tanner and others, for the extending of the time in which applications for pensions may be filed, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of Peter O'Donnoghue, for compensation for damage to his property on account of public improvements in the District of Columbia, to the Committee for the District of Columbia

By Mr. WARREN: The petition of John Dillon, for compensation for injuries incurred while at work in the Charlestown navy-yard, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: The petition of Captain A. C. Rhind, United States Navy, for restoration to his proper position in the Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communica-tion from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of February 9, a copy of the report of S. T. Abert, United States civil engineer, with accompanying maps, examinations, and surveys, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, directing the survey of "a line between the Neuse and Cape Fear Rivers, in North Carolina," &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, directing him to furnish to the Senate any information which he may have touching the submission of "straw-bids," or probable worthless or fraudulent bids, for carrying the mails of the United States in the several States in which advertisements for mail proposals appeared October 1, 1875; which, on motion of Mr. Hamlin, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In order to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects, I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate. The bill was sent there yesterday before my motion was made. The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a petition which prays Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a petition which prays for certain legislation set forth, on the subject of secret societies. The petition is signed, as I am informed, by residents of every State and Territory in the United States. The whole number of petitioners exceeds 16,000. I ask that the petition be read, that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the petition, which is brief, be printed in the Record.

The Chief Clerk read the petition, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as follows.

mittee on the Judiciary, as follows:

mittee on the Judiciary, as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, believing (in the words of Daniel Webster) "that all secret associations, the members of which take upon themselves extraordinary obligations to one another and are bound together by secret oaths, are naturally sources of jealousy and just alarm to others, are especially unfavorable to harmony and mutual confidence among men living together under popular institutions, and are dangerous to the general cause of civil liberty and good government," respectfully ask your honorable body to withdraw the charter given by Congress in April, 1864, to the Masonie Hall Association of the District of Columbia.

We further petition that it be made unlawful to appoint to official positions under the Government of the United States persons who are under and acknowledge the binding character of oaths administered by secret organizations.

Also, that in United States courts, in all cases, criminal or civil, the right of peremptory challenge of jurors who are members of any secret society shall be granted to all parties in litigation.

And that membership in any secret society by the presiding officer of a court shall be held to be a sufficient reason for change of venue whenever demanded.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of 106 citizens of Rochelle, Michigan, praying that the duty on linseed and linseed-oil be retained as now fixed by law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of officers of the New York Harbor Towing Company, praying that the name of the steamboat Harbor Towing Company, praying that the name of the steamboat Peter Crary be changed to Joseph L. Chapman; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented a petition of 428 citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of a law regulating elections and the elective franchise in the Territory of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. THURMAN. I present the petition of Jeremiah Cain, late lieutenant in the volunteer service of the United States, setting forth that during the war, owing to a misapprehension, he was dismissed from service for not reporting in time; that the sentence was re-versed on its being shown that he had not received orders to report in time to do it, and he was restored to his rank as second lieutenant; but in the settlement of his accounts the Department deducted from his claim pay for the period before he was restored. He prays that he may have that pay. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Bushby, praying compensation for cooking for military prisoners from April, 1863, to July, 1865, to report it back adversely. I will state in reference to this case, as there is no written report, that we find simply a petition, but no evidence whatever in its support. I move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John Cleary, of Hinds County, Mississippi, praying compensation for certain goods, wares, and merchandise taken from him for the use of the United States Government and for a store-house destroyed by the military forces of the United States during the war of streyed by the limitary forces of the chief states during the war of the rebellion, instruct me to report it back adversely, for the reason in the first place that there was no evidence whatever in support of the petition—a part of the claim is cognizable before the southern claims commission—and as to the property destroyed there is no statement of even the circumstances under which the destruction took place nor of the value of the property. I move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Nelson Potter, praying an appropriation in payment of his claim for certain property taken and used by the United States during the war of the rebellion, which was rejected by the claims commission, ask to be discharged from its further consideration. We find that the claim was submitted to the southern claims commission, was passed upon by the southern claims commission after full testimony, and the committee see no reason whatever for reviewing that action. I move that the committee be discharged from its further considera-

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel W. Lancaster, of Madison County, Mississippi, praying that compensation be given to him for certain property taken from him and used and destroyed by the United States during the war of the rebellion, instruct me to report it back adversely for the reason that the committee has applied to the other cases just reported, there being no evidence whatever in support of the petition. I i the committee be discharged from its further consideration. I move that

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Walter L. Campbell, of Pike County, Mississippi, praying payment of certain rents and cost of repairs on property in New Orleans occupied by the Government, instruct me to report the same back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and to state in support of their recommendation that there is nothing to show why this claim was not presented to the Quartermaster General, and there is no proof of any injury to the property nor of the value of the property for which it is claimed payment should be made. I move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jennie L. Wall, praying for an appropriation of $225 to pay her salary as clerk in the Treasury Department for the months of September, October, and November, 1871, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Charles E. Hovey, praying compensation for expenses incurred and services rendered by him in the collection of certain moneys under a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 6, 1873, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey. The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 313) to incorporate the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia, to report the same adversely. The committee see no guarantee to the people of this District that a better gas than that already furnished or one at a lower price can be secured to the people of the District. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill
(S. No. 528) to incorporate the Capital Gas Company of the District of Columbia, has also instructed me to report it adversely. The same reasons have induced them to report this bill adversely as in the previous case. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Streeter, of Junction City, Kansas, praying compensation for property seized by the United States forces at Memphis during the late rebellion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of so amending the law for the entry of homestead lands as to permit soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphans, to make entry of such lands through agents, asked to be discharged from its further consider-ation, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Eaton G. Horner, of Baltimore, Whom was referred the petition of Eaton G. Horner, of Battimore, Maryland, praying compensation for services rendered by him to the secret-service division of the Treasury Department in 1867, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the consideration of the petition.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS W. SYKES

Mr. COOPER. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred a resolution relating to the payment of compensation to Francis W. Sykes, to report it back and ask its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, anthorized and directed to pay to Francis W. Sykes, late contestant from the State of Alabama, the pay and mileage of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SARGENT and Mr. WRIGHT. I object."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

Mr. COOPER. The resolution is accompanied by a written report, and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 577) to establish a post-route in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 576) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to approve certain bills incurred by the direct-tax commissioners; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yesterday I submitted an order withdrawing from the archives of the Senate the papers of C. M. Briggs, executor, against the United States and referring them to the Committee on Claims. I am advised that the Committee on Claims reported against this case. I now desire to modify the order so as to allow the peti-tioner to withdraw his petition and papers instead of referring them to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

BILLS TO BE IN PRINT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a concurrent resolution and a Senate resolution, upon which I ask permission to detain the Senate for a few

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the fifth and sixth joint rules of the two Houses be, and the same are hereby, amended by the omission of the following words in brackets and the addition of the following words in italies, so that they will read:

"5. While bills are on their passage between the two Houses they shall be in print, on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House respectively.

"6. After the bill shall have passed both Houses it shall be duly enrolled in print on vellum by the Clerk of the House of Representatives or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States."

"—th Rule. A motion to suspend or concur in a resolution of the House of Representatives to suspend the fifth and sixth joint rules, or either of them, shall always be in order, immediately considered, and decided without debate."

Mr. ANTHONY. It did not occur to me in offering the concurrent resolution that we have not yet adopted the joint rules of the two Houses; and I will, therefore, with your permission, modify the mo-tion and ask to have it referred to the Committee on Rules, and I shall move its reference in proper form.

The joint rules of the two Houses of Congress provide that every bill which has passed one House shall be engrossed on paper and communicated to the other, under the signature of the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House, as the case may be; and that every bill which has passed both Houses shall be engrossed on parchment, and, after receiving the signature of the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, shall be presented to the President by the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills. The rule and the practice of Congress guard with jealous care the authenticity and the accuracy of bills as they pass through the two Houses and go to the President.

A bill, when it has been duly enrolled, examined, found correct, and signed, first by the Speaker of the House, then by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, is given into the custody of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and is, by a member thereof, given in person to the President. It is not out of the keeping of the committee till it is in the hands of the President. At least such was the careful practice when I was a member of that committee, and I presume that it is now; and a Senator or Representative with an enrolled bill was entitled, by custom, to immediate audience of the President, however he might be engaged in important concerns. When signed by the President, the enrolled bills having become acts of Congress are delivered to the Department of State, where they are kept in a fire-proof apartment, and are in the immediate custody of the clerk of the rolls, who allows no other person to have access to them, except for important reasons, and never but in his presence. Yet, with all these precautions, the acts of Congress do not escape altogether the defects and imperfections that pertain to all human things. Grave errors have sometimes been found in the engrossment and in the enrollment. The addition or the omission of a word has affected great rights and permanent interests; the substitution of and for or has changed the whole intent of an enactment; and lately the accidental insertion of a comma took more than half a million dollars out of the Treasury. The use of parchment for important records dates back to a period beyond the invention of paper, and after long surviving its real su-periority for the purpose, it has given way to the more modern inaterial everywhere but in Congress and in the general court of Massa-chusetts. So Mr. Sumner stated in a speech delivered in this Chamber in 1862, in support of a resolution directing the discontinuance of parchment and the substitution of paper for the enrollment of the

This change would be a wise one. Parchment is cumbrous, inconvenient, requires more space for custody, and is less easy of examination. Its durability extends beyond any test to which time has subjected it; and although the time has not, of course, been near as long in which paper has been tested, and although it is of more fragile texture, there is no reason to doubt its equal durability for all practical purposes. The earliest paper printed or written is preserved in many instances, with no evidence of decay. I hold a piece of paper taken from the Bordeaux wine accounts, A. D. 1325, which is preserved in the public record office, London, and sent to me by Colonel Cole, formerly a clerk in that office.

But the necessity for imperishable material on which to record the acts of Congress disappears with their official publication, by which copies of equal authenticity with the rolls themselves are distributed all over the country, and made accessible not only to the courts and to official personages, but to every one who may choose to buy them. The printed statute is made by law the same evidence as the rolls in the Department of State. There remains no necessity for consulting the rolls, and if, by fire or other accident, they should be destroyed, it would cause no embarrassment in the interpretation of the statutes or in the administration of the law. The printed volume of the Revised Statutes would furnish all the information with all the authenticity, all the authority of the originals. It would seem, then, that Congress might safely follow the example of the British Parliament, of the French Assembly, and, so far as Mr. Sunner's always thorough re-searches went, the example of all other legislative bodies but the Legislature of Massachusetts, and substitute linen paper for parchment in the enrollment of the laws.

It is to be considered that the long durability of writing, in the examples that have come down to us on parchment and on paper, is due ampies that have come down to us on parchment and on paper, is due largely to two conditions, the ink and the pen. The ancient ink preserves its color better than the modern. It was made with greater care and of vegetable materials, and has not the corrosive properties of modern ink. The greater demand for ink for printing and for writing has compelled its manufacture from new materials and by new processes, which, however preferable in the amount of production, in cheapness, and in the convenience of use, lack the durability of the old methods. It is referabling to the every table when a book of the old methods. It is refreshing to the eye to look upon a book of the fifteenth century, the paper smooth, fine, and as uniform in its color as when it was made, and the letters looking like jet set upon ivory. Even within my recollection, ink was an article of domestic produc-Even within my recollection, ink was an article of domestic production, and school-boys and country merchants made it for themselves. I have steeped the nut-galls and the logwood for many a gallon of ink, and could almost recall the formula now by which the compound was mixed. The pens with which the old records were inscribed were goose-quills, which traveled over the paper and left the ink upon it without breaking the surface. Modern writing is generally with metallic pens, which cut the calendered surface of the paper and leggit hence their a correction in that saiges upon the internal paper. and deposit beneath it a corrosive ink that seizes upon the inner pulp and will cause the paper to decay. This is true, in part, of writing on parchment as well as on paper.

But the resolution which I propose goes much beyond the substitution of parchment-paper for parchment in the permanent records of the Government. It proposes to substitute printing for writing, both in the engrossment and in the enrollment of bills; that every bill passed by one House of Congress and sent to the other shall be in print, and that the bills presented to the President for his signature shall likewise be printed on strong linen paper, with ink of the most durable quality and not corrosive. This is the practice of the British Parliament. I have here specimens of the bills of Parliament in both houses and in the different stages of their passage, as originally introduced, as transmitted to the other house, as sent back with amendments, and as again returned with amendments agreed to or disagreed to. Their mode differs from ours and is in some respects better, as showing at a glance the condition of the amendments adopted or proposed or disagreed to, and the house from which they come.

The great advantages of printing over writing are accuracy, legibility, security from alteration, and absolute authenticity and identity of copies. These points are too clear to need illustration. No mode of engrossment can be absolutely free from error. It is also true that typographical mistakes will occur in the most careful typesetting and will escape the most rigid proof-reading and revision. But the y are much less frequent than in writing and they are more surely detected in time for correction. Once printed, no ingenuity can alter the original; and, even if it could, the alteration would be at once exposed by the variation from the copies struck from the same form. The statutes which are now printed from the rolls—or rather from copies made from the rolls, for the originals are not permitted to leave the Department of State and are necessarily copied at some risk of error, and which are made by law evidence in the courts—could be printed from the very forms of type from which the originals are taken, and thus all liability to error in copying would be avoided. Or, if it were not thought advisable to print them in so large type for general distribution, they could be so printed for the files of all the courts and for the use of all the officers, Federal or State, to whom the statutes are distributed; and the same authentic and identical edition might be printed for those who should choose to purchase it; and the cost would be so moderate that the legal profession, public officers, corporations, and all who required the statutes for reference or consultation, would be likely to buy them. In a lesser but in an important degree, the same advantages would accrue to the substitution of printing for writing in the bills between the two Houses of Congress. They would be more legible, less liable to error, and would be acted on more intelligently.

The objection to this change is in the delay that it might cause in the longer time required for printing than for writing. How far this objection is true, and its value if true, we will consider. In the early objection is true, and its value if true, we will consider. In the early part of the session, indeed during the whole session, up to within a few days of the close, the delay is not worthy of consideration, inasmuch as bills, whether original or coming from the other House, are always printed before they are taken up for action, and a copy is laid on the desk of every member. No practical delay is caused, and some accuracy is secured, by printing the original bill and striking from the same form the copies for the use of the members of the two Houses of

It is always customary, and perhaps it is necessary, that some of the great appropriation bills are passed in the closing hours of Congress, and often, loaded with important legislation, are presented to the President when he has scarcely time to affix his signature, none to inform himself thoroughly of the new laws and of the modifications of old ones to which he gives his assent. This is an evil, I may say an abuse, that has often been protested against, and that the joint rules of the two Houses expressly forbid. The sixteenth joint rule provides that no bill that has passed one House shall be presented for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session, and the seventeenth provides that no bill or resolution shall be presented to the President for his approbation on the last day of the session. Both these wholesome rules earlied to the provides that no the last day of the session. sion. Both these wholesome rules, so plainly necessary for the intelligent transaction of business, are uniformly suspended. They have never been permitted to remain in force since I have been a member of this body. Mr. Buchanan, in one of his messages, called attention to this bad system of legislation, and intimated that he should deem it his right and his duty to withhold his signature from any bill, however essential to the carrying on of the Government, unless he had time to fairly consider it; and that the remedy would be a special session for which Congress, not he, would be responsible. But Congress did not reform its practice and the President did not execute his threat; but, like all his predecessors, and as all his successors have done, he signed bills to which he had not time to give the proper consideration, and his information of which was gained mainly as they went through Congress. Any system therefore which should compel the enforcement of these rules would be an advantage, of itself, worth the experiment. But although this objection is rather a recommendation, I cannot adduce it in favor of the change proposed; for I do not think that, even in the most hurried stage of our proceedings, there will be any greater delay in engrossing the bills in type than with the pen. The longest of the appropriation bills, which are the ones that crowd the closing hours of the session, can be printed in two hours. It can be printed more rapidly than it can be written with any reasonable force of engrossing clerks. Only one man can write upon one sheet of parchment. The number of clerks employed in the written engrossment must be limited to the number of sheets of parchment which the bill covers, for the sheet cannot be divided; and it takes twenty minutes for a skillful clerk to engross one sheet. In order that engrossment might go on as rapidly as printing, it would require such number of clerks as would be inconvenient and expensive, and the whole number would be needed only at the close of the session. But to print it requires no force of printers additional to that in the constant service of the Government. As many printers can be employed as the pieces into which a bill can be divided. At the first session of the last Congress, the whole body of the statutes was put into type, the volume printed, handsomely bound, and presented to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws in three days. When the Government Printing Office is connected with the Capitol by a pneumatic tube, I am of the opinion that bills can be engrossed in print more rapidly than in writing. This connection has once been ordered, but the appropriation, by blunder or something worse, was wasted. The the appropriation, by blunder or something worse, was wasted. The cost is small, the need of it is very great, and the practicability has been tested, as will soon be shown in a report on the subject from the Committee on Printing, which has had the subject under consideration by order of the Senate. Whether a change shall be made or not in the mode of engrossing and of enrolling bills, it is plain that a pneumatic tube should be placed between the Printing Office and the Capitol.

The liability to error in rapid writing is greater than in rapid printing. Rapid printing is merely the division of the matter to be printed among a greater number of men. A hundred printers will do in half an hour the work that will occupy one man for a week, and will do it just as accurately, the hundred not working faster than the one. It is not so when a bill covering ten sheets of parchment is divided among ten clerks, who necessarily write as rapidly as they can. And, besides this, rapidity of writing is at the risk of legibility. But the types, however rapidly they are set, give the same clear and distinct impression. They leave no marks of haste; they are capable of but one aspect.

Yet, for the sake of greater caution in making this change and to remove objections which I do not perceive, but which may appear to others, I propose that the same privilege which applies to the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules shall be given to these: that a motion to suspend them shall be always in order, shall be immediately considered, and shall be decided without debate; so that if, at the close of the session, the rules should give rise to any embarrassment, it might at once be removed by a return to the present system. With this abundant precaution, I can see no danger, and there will certainly be great advantages in the change proposed.

I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the Senator does that, I ask him to allow me to make a suggestion. I do not know that there is anything worthy of consideration in it, but in reading this proposed rule I find in it these words:

After the bill shall have passed both Houses it shall be duly enrolled, in print, on vellum by the Clerk of the House of Representatives or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House.

I would suggest that the words be changed to "be enrolled in print under the direction of the Clerk of the House or Secretary of the Senate," because it seems to imply that this Clerk or Secretary of the Senate," because it seems to imply that this Clerk or Secretary shall be a printer and shall do it himself. I think if the Senator, before he commits it, will modify his resolution in this way it will be in better form.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept that amendment. In copying the old rule it did not occur to me that this language would not be applicable

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification is accepted by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if he proposes that this rule also may be suspended, and a motion to suspend it be at any time in order, and decided without de-bate, as well as the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules? Mr. ANTHONY. That is provided for in a second rule that I have

Mr. SARGENT. As I understand, the second rule applies only to the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules.

Mr. ANTHONY. It applies to the rules which include this new provision.

Mr. SARGENT. Here is another rule, and if this is not capable of being suspended I see no advantage in suspending the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules.

Mr. ANTHONY. The first resolution makes this proposed rule a substitute for the present fifth and sixth joint rules.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill which I have before me, printed by order of the English Parliament, evidently was not hurried through that body. I find that it was brought from the Commons on the 16th of May, 1865, and the order to print was made on the 30th of June, 1865; that is to say, about a month and a half after it was received from the Commons. They were proceeding very deliberately. They must have been proceeding very deliberately, because here is not merely the printing of a bill, but the addition of marginal notes as we put them in the Revised Statutes and in other statutes, and again there is printing in colors. Every printer knows that printing in colors is a double operation. You have to prepare your form for that. I will not use technical terms, although I believe the Senator from Rhode Island is or was formerly like myself a printer. It is a very slow operation and is only adapted to legislation in a very slow progress. We are accustomed to suspend the sixteenth or seventeenth joint rule regularly. It is just the same as though we had no such rules I find that it was brought from the Commons on the 16th of ress. We are accustomed to suspend the sixteenth or seventeenth joint rule regularly. It is just the same as though we had no such rules at all. They are suspended regularly under an absolute necessity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a custom, let me say to my friend, that I think we should do well in breaking, and following the rules. More mischief is perpetrated by suspending those rules than in any other way. We might just as well finish the work two days before the adjournment as at any other time.

Mr. SARGENT. I agree with the Senator entirely, but he has rather anticipated me in what I wanted to say anticipated me in what I wanted to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon.
Mr. SARGENT. I could give in my own experience on the Committee on Appropriations some striking mischiefs which have arisen from the suspension of these rules. I know of my own knowledge that the last sundry civil appropriation bill that passed contained a number of errors, errors caused by engrossment where there were amendments made by the House which were assented to by the Senate and some which were made by the Senate and assented to by the House in committee of conference which the clerks did not catch, or did not properly reproduce, in making out the report of the committee of conference. You may ask, why did not those of us who were members of the committee of conference see that they did everything correctly? I can only tell you it was at the end of forty-eight hours of exhaustive labor, that the ordinary clerks who attended to that duty were worn out and could not perform the duty, and we had to accept volunteers or press men into the service. Under those circumstances, at a very late hour, the bill passed with those errors, and some of them pretty bad errors too. That very bill, three minutes before your hammer went down on the 4th of March, was taken from the desk and hurried to the President of the United States for his signature, barely saving the distance and saving an extra session.

I remember another occasion where the sundry civil bill, a bill which we all know appropriates from twenty to thirty millions of dollars, could not be sent to a committee of conference. On that occasion the House of Representatives, of which I was then a member, had to take the amendments of the Senate without examining them, and the bill was passed in just that shape, although there were some of the amendments which perhaps should have been a a matter of consideration and which were perhaps passed in haste by

These mischiefs are continually arising because we crowd everything into the last week of the session. I do not know that we can help that, except by a rule which would be absolutely irrepealable, which there should be no power to suspend during the Congress. Then we can have the bills printed and can insist on a rule that there shall be no bill which shall be sent from one House to the other during the last three days of the session. If we absolutely stick to that, we can print our bills, and do it decently; but to endeavor to realize this system at the hour of midnight of the last day of the session is absolutely impossible; and I believe it would result in more errors than the present system. As this subject is to be referred to a committee, I want to make the suggestion—and I speak from painful experience of the mischiefs of the present system—that the committee make their rule irrepealable, and then I think it will be wholesome.

Mr. ANTHONY. The objection which the Senator makes to double

Mr. ANTHONY. The objection which the Senator makes to double printing in black and in red ink is a perfectly valid one, if you require a double printing on every bill; but the resolution which I offered did not contemplate double printing, although it would be very convenient to have it done. I merely adduced that as an illustration of the superior carefulness with which bills and acts of Parliament are carried through the two Houses in England.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion to call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to the fact that so far we have no joint rules at all at this session, and we are doing far we have no joint rules at all at this session, and we are doing business with the House of Representatives merely upon custom and usage. I cannot help expressing my surprise, if I can do that without invading the privileges of the House of Representatives, that we have not between the two Houses at this lapse of time reached a conclusion about having any joint rules at this tapse of time reached a conclusion about having any joint rules at this session of Congress. What it means, of course I do not know; but the first time anything is offered which comes necessarily under the joint rules, and not on the principle of usage, I shall, if I am present—and I am sure the Chair will, whether I am present or not—remind the Senate that according to our decision we have no joint rules whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island be printed and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Rules

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved. That the proceedings and debates of the Senate shall be printed in the Congressional Record as actually taken down by the Official Reporter, excepting grammatical errors which may be corrected, and shall be furnished to the printer in season for the number of the Record to be issued next after the day of such proceedings and debates.

I merely wish to say on the question of the reference of the resolution, that I have offered it because it embodies precisely what I believe ought to be the course of the Senate, and I hope the Committee on Printing will take it into serious consideration. It is almost as bad as not having any record at all in respect of the debates, to have as not having any record at all in respect of the debates, to have important debates lying over day after day, and sometimes for a week or two, before they appear at all, and during which time it is impossible for persons interested in the debates, Senators or others, to know what has been said or what has taken place, what needs replying to and what does not. If the publication of the debates is conducted in that way, when we do rely upon the RECORD we are obscured in our knowledge of the proceedings. I think that the expense we resort to to print these debates is well spent, if we have them printed as they are delivered so that we and everybody else may know that what is reported has taken place and that nothing else has taken place; and we should also have them promptly next day without any delay or defalcation, so that we may be up with the current course of debate and proceedings on topics that are not disposed of.

defalcation, so that we may be up with the current course of debate and proceedings on topics that are not disposed of.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will remember that the Committee on Printing reported a resolution somewhat similar to this, but more comprehensive, and it met with less favor than I hoped it would in the Senate. I should be happy to try it again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, but I am bound to presume it met with less favor because the Senator had reported a rule having too much laxity in respect of the time within which the debates should get into the RECORD and the amount of treatment they should reget into the RECORD and the amount of treatment they should receive between the time they were delivered and the time they did get into the RECORD. I cannot help believing that if the Senator reports a resolution which is absolutely square and positive that we shall have the debates next day and have them in the form in which they are delivered, there will not be any difficulty in getting a unanimous adoption of it. I certainly hope so.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses, without day, on the 1st day of May, 1876, at twelve o'clock noon.

I need hardly say that I offer this resolution without consultation with any one. I offer it as embodying my opinion as to the day upon which we can adjourn with safety to the public interests. I am ready to concede that in view of the progress made up to this time there is but little to encourage us in the hope that we can adjourn then. I have hoped, however, that the subsequent advance made in business may be such that we can adjourn at that time. This is all I desire to say at present. I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the present. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the resolution may be referred as such esolutions usually are to the Committee on Appropriations; and with the Senator's consent I make the motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Is the morning business through?

Mr. WEST. Is the morning business through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the morning business is concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business, the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] relative to the admission of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. WEST. I do not rise to occupy the attention of the Senate on that subject. I rise in pursuance of a notice that I gave to the Senate on Monday last that I should to day if convertenity offered set.

ate on Monday last that I should to-day, if opportunity offered, ask their attention to some remarks that I desire to submit upon the rela-tions of the Pacific railroads to the Government of the United States. It is hardly worth while for me to enter upon a discussion of the propostion at the present moment, and I prefer, therefore, to give notice that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall call up the executive communication from the Secretary of the Treasury with a view to its reference, and will then take the opportunity to submit the remarks I have to make.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from Georgia, whom I do not see in his seat, [Mr. GORDON,] gave notice yesterday that he would occupy the floor to-morrow at one o'clock

Mr. WEST. That being the case, perhaps it would suit the convenience of the Senate if I should go on to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better dispose of the pending ques-

Mr. WEST. The matter that I want to submit to the Senate is one of public concern, and is of general interest, and of as much importance to any other Senator on the floor as it is to myself. If it suits the convenience of the Senate to postpone the present order-I shall not make a motion to that effect—it will perhaps enable me to have an opportunity that seems to be in danger of procrastination by the proposition of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the Senator to the fact that last week the bill for the admission of New Mexico into the Union was made the special order for to-day at

Mr. EDMUNDS. That bill has been recommitted since then.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been again reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a special order now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill was re-reported yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not make it a special order for to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will be allowed to proceed with his remarks if the Senator who has charge of the Louisiana case does not object.

Louisiana case does not object.

Mr. MORTON. I do not object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope, then, he will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there are several Senators who have charge of the Louisiana question. It has got out of committee, and I think I can claim that I have charge of one small part of it, which is a pending motion of mine. I must be excused from supposing that the Senator from Indiana has charge of my motion to amend the resolution. the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. Only a single word.

Mr. ANTHONY. Only a single word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion is to amend by inserting only a single word, and that not a very important word! I think, Mr. President, in all seriousness that we are running some risk of appearing to ourselves, if to nobody else, as having a design to shilly-shally with this most important affair. It is only two days ago that the Senator from Indiana himself gave notice, as it was wise and right that he should, that on yesterday he would insist upon our staying here until the matter was disposed of one way or the other. We did not do it on account of another matter running a long time, and there being some important executive business. Now here it is again to-day. I do not know how it is going to be decided, and I do not care how it is going to be decided in the sense of the consequence that it produces one way or the other; but whatever we are to do we ought to do it, now way or the other; but whatever we are to do we ought to do it, now that argument apparently has been exhausted and everybody is here to determine the question. Therefore I am sure my friend from Louisiana, who has not himself insisted upon the courtesy of the Senate to displace this order, will not feel that we are doing him any discourtesy if we dispose of this question which probably will not take half an hour.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would like to inquire if the Senate did not make an order some days since that the New Mexico bill should be the special order for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate did so order, but by subsequent action of the Senate the bill was recommitted and it has thus lost its place as a special order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The unfinished business would take precedence of it in any case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business would take precedence in any event, but the bill has lost its place as a special order by being recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

order by being recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may be true technically that the New Mexico bill has lost its place as a special order for to-day at one o'clock, but I hardly suppose that any Senator would desire to take advantage of that technicality. I do not imagine that it will take any great length of time. I do not think lengthy discussion will be evoked on this bill. I hope the Senator from Vermont will allow the consideration of the New Mexico bill to be proceeded with now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska understood the Chair that the unfinished business would take precedence of any special order. It would require a motion to lay aside the unof any special order. It would require a motion to lay aside the unfinished business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also understood from the Senator having charge of the unfinished business that he would not antagonize it with the New Mexico bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to lay aside the pending unfinished business?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make that motion. I move to lay aside the unfinished business and all prior orders, and take up the New Mexico

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is meant by the words "lay aside?" I do

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is meant by the words "lay aside?" I do not know of any such motion in the books.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To postpone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the New Mexico bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was paired yesterday on this question with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. English.] Although I did not understand that the pair would extend to to-day, I apprehend that he Under such circumstances, it would not be proper for me to vote, and therefore I shall not vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yeas 22,

So the motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school-indemnity selec-tions of public lands by the State of Nebraska; A bill (H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phœbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan. The message also returned to the Senate, in accordance with its request, the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuance of the work on the building for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Morton on the 5th March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Edmunds to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."
Mr. WEST. I did not intend, Mr. President, to have said anything further on this question. If there ever was one that came under the consideration of the Senate, at least in my experience, that was worn threadbare, it is this; and if there are any new propositions in connection with it they come mostly from those who oppose the admission of Mr. Pinchback on this floor. Some of those propositions are so extraordinary, so novel, so violative of all usage and precedents in this Senate, that I do not think they ought to be passed without no-

There was one to which I would refer, made yesterday, which was partially controverted at the time, and now I wish again to ask the attention of the Senate to it. That was that the credentials of this claimant had been actually acted upon and adversely determined by a committee of this body. In the first place, I think undoubtedly the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Forty-second Congress could have no jurisdiction whatever over this case; that if they had invisition and their report had been writted to that if they had jurisdiction, and their report had been submitted to this body at that time, that the claimant, Mr. Pinchback, was not entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress, the determination of that question would have been voted upon by men who were not competent to decide it, and whose decision could be reversed.

But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] took occasion, inadvertently perhaps and inadvertently I believe, to directly mislead the Senate in regard to the facts. He assumed to quote from the record that this man's credentials had been submitted to that committee. It lies with him now to substantiate what he said, that Mr. Pinchback's credentials had been submitted to the committee on the 21st of January, 1873. Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEST. I yield with pleasure.
Mr. MERRIMON. I got the information I gave to the Senate from the Clerk's desk, from a memorandum made on the credentials themselves. I ask the Clerk to turn to the credentials and read the memorandum that is indorsed on them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the memorandum indorsed on the credentials.

The Chief Clerk. The indorsements are as follows:

Forty-second Congress, third session. Credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, United States Senator from the State of

January 21, 1873, read.

December 4, 1873, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

That is the indorsement on one set of credentials. Again:

Forty-third Congress, second session.

Certificate of William P. Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, as to the election of Pinckney B. S. Pinchback as United States Senator from that State.

January 22, 1875, read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with credentials and papers on file.

There is one further set of papers indorsed:

Forty-third Congress, first session.

Resolution of the State of Louisiana relative to P. B. S. Pinchback, claiming a seat in the United States Senate from that State.

January 12, 1874, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not regard the memorandum as having a great deal of weight on the matter one way or the other. I just stepped to the Clerk's desk while the discussion was running on one day, and took the memorandum which I have here now:

Ray's credentials referred January 22, 1873; Pinchback's, January 21, 1873.

And I found, on looking at the resolution directing the committee And I found, on tooking at the resolution directing the committee to inquire as to whether there was a government in Louisiana, that that resolution passed the Senate on the 16th of January, 1873.

Mr. WEST. When the Senator rose in his place yesterday, he had in his hand a book that had the appearance of being a volume of the Journals of the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. I had the report of the committee. If the memorandum states that there was no reference, it was a mere inadvertence on my part, and not a very material matter any way. I think I saw the memorandum in the hands of the Clerk; perhaps I had it in my own hands; but I know that I thought at the time that the resolutions and credentials were referred together, and that the committee had the whole matter before it.

Mr. WEST. The Senator was evidently under a mistake. Mr. WEST.

Mr. WEST. The Senator was evidency under a inistance.

Mr. MERRIMON. Perhaps I was; it is not material any way.

Mr. WEST. It is not material, so far as the Senator is concerned; but the proposition is very material, and that is, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections virtually decided in the Ray and McMillen case that Pinchback was not entitled to his seat.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think they did so decide; and furthermore my recollection is—I may be in error about that—that Mr. Pinchback was before the committee and examined as a witness, and that he attended the examination before the committee and managed the case in his own interest; because he saw naturally that the action of the committee would materially affect his prospects in the future; and I think it was regarded by the committee and by the Senate and by everybody as having a conclusive bearing on his rights.

Mr. WEST. I trust that I have now given the Senator ample opportunity to explain. His explanation is satisfactory, because evidently he did not intend to mislead the Senate; but what I wish to guard against is that the Senate should not be misled. Mr. MERRIMON. It was a mere inadvertence.

Mr. WEST. It was an inadvertence, but the fact was most positively stated with a great deal of confidence.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to make one remark. The committee were charged to inquire whether there was any State government in the State of Louisiana. That embraced not only the governor, but the Legislature as well, the Legislature which elected Ray, whose credentials were before the committee; and the Legislature whose organization was inquired into by that committee was the very same Legislature which undertook to elect Pinchback, and under which election he claims here to-day, and no other.

Mr. WEST. The only time that this claimant's case has ever been before any committee was when the credentials were referred, on the 4th of December, 1873, and were reported back by the chairman of the committee on December 15, 1873, stating that the committee was divided on the subject and asking that the matter be remitted to the Senate and the committee discharged. That is the history of the case; and the whole issue brought before the Committee on Privileges and Elections as reported by what was known as the Carpenter report was simply whether Ray or McMillen was entitled to a seat.

If upon this claimant's demand here to be admitted to a seat on this floor you adopt the proposition of the Senator from Vermont that he is not so entitled, you adopt a report made in the Forty-second Congress and thereby exclude this claimant. You do not give him the opportunity to come before you, you do not give him the opportunity that according to all precedent and universal usage has been accorded to every Senator claiming a seat here, that he should be admitted upon his evidence of title and that that title should be at a subsequent time investigated and examined if there be any question about it. What more do you do?

Mr. MERRIMON. With the Senator's permission, Mr. Presi-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.
Mr. MERRIMON. I want to call the attention of the Senate to how I made the inadvertence. The memorandum is "1873, January 21," with an abbreviation, and I took the abbreviation for "referred," whereas it is intended for the word "read." That is the way I made the inadvertence. It was wholly unintentional on my part.

Mr. WEST. I will not recur to this matter further than to say that I knew the Senator did not intend it; but I did not want that impression to be left on the Senate, and that is the reason I controverted the proposition.

I was about to ask what more do you do when you decide that this man, claiming under the authority of the governor of the State of Louisiana and the Legislature at that time elected, is not entitled to a seat? It is the verdict of the Senate that the government of Louisiana is invalid and illegal. It is a decision of the Senate upon nothing but a presumption that Mr. Kellogg was not elected and that the Legislature was not elected. You have just as much right to presume that they were as that they were not, if you are to act upon presumption at all; and if you do act upon presumption, all the presumptions point most conclusively to the fact, all the history of political parties in that State, all the history of that canvass, points to the fact that the presumption lies in favor of the election of the Legislature under which this claimant now is before us.

We know what was the state of things there at that time. We know that an attempt at fraud without parallel in the election history of this country was made, for the purpose of annihilating and setting aside a legitimate majority in that State; and although we may not be willing to accord to either side in this case full legal authority for their claims, yet we have a right to call into question what was the probable result of that election. We have a right to inquire and to be informed whether on the occasion of that election it is not a fair and just and equitable presumption that when the ballotboxes closed on the night of November 4, 1872, in those boxes was the verdict of the people of Louisiana that the republican candidates were chosen. It is well known to the Senate and it is well known to every one who has ever heard me say a word on this subject, either in or out of this body, that I lay no claim to the title of William P. Kellogg upon any fraudulent or manufactured returns made by one party or the other; but I say an examination of the testimony and knowledge of the history of the parties in that State must convince every unprejudiced and fair-minded man that when the ballot-boxes closed on prejudiced and fair-influed man that when the barlot-boxes closed on that day the voting community in that State had recorded their verdict in favor of Mr. Kellogg; and I assert that when you say that this man should not be admitted you are acting upon a presumption that has been denied and is to-day no longer insisted upon by the very committee that made it. There are three members out of the four who made that report in this body now. One of them, and a leading member, who made it, whose term has expired, the late Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Carpenter,] took occasion to say in that very report that he was elected, the only other conclusion and the only other alternative was that Mr. Kellogg himself was elected. Then the other three members of the committee who joined in that report, each one of them admits that subsequent events which have come to the knowledge of the Senate, which have come to the knowledge of all mankind in this the Senate, which have come to the knowledge or all mankind in this country, go to corroborate the idea and to make it a fixity that the republican party predominated on that day. That result has been admitted by every known authority in this land that has cognizance of the question—by this body, by the President of the United States, by the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress, by the democratic House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress, by the courts of the State of Louisiana, and by the people of Louisiana in vating for constitutional amendments propounded and subana in voting for constitutional amendments propounded and submitted to them by that Legislature; and, furthermore, by the Legislature elected by the people in 1874 in the State of Louisiana recognition has been given to that governor, and he stands to-day unques find has been given to that governor, and he stands to-day unquestioned by any authority or any contestant.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I will admit that no man can perfect a title of this character by age, but there have events and information transpired, some of which I have mentioned, and others again that place it beyond controversy, that it is the admitted public opinion in the State of Louisiana to-day that Mr. Kellogg was lawfully elected on that occasion. We had a committee of the House of Representatives visiting Louisiana about thirteen months ago. It was composed of seven members. Two of the five, "Messrs. Foster and Phelps, think that the popular belief, taking both conservative and radical circles, inclines on the whole to justify Kellogg and Penn's claims."

If presumptions are to be acted upon and to influence this Senate, I ask that those presumptions shall weigh as well on one side as another. This I will admit is nothing but a presumption; it is the conclusion formed by those two observant gentlemen in their intercourse with the people of that State in the investigation of matters connected with the election of that date, that the opinion of the people of Louisiana generally looks to the support of Kellogg's claim. Three other members of the committee, Messrs. Hoar, Wheeler, and Frye, say:

It would be impossible at this distance of time, and probably at any time, to go behind the returns and ascertain the true expression of the people's will. But our best judgment is that Governor Kellogg was elected.

It is said that this Legislature was created by the Durell order, and that the Durell order put into effect the manufactured returns of the Lynch board. Nevertheless, either one or both of those acts could not deprive any member of that Legislature of his legitimate right, nor could it give it to him. Those members of the Legislature were according to all the evidence, all the presumptions, legally elected; and whether they got their seats through that instrumentality or not, it occurs to me, has nothing to do with the question. You propose now upon this report, made on certainly a very hasty examination of the circumstances, and made at the close, and the hurried close, of a short session of Congress, to decide virtually that there was no elec-tion on that occasion in Louisiana, and furthermore that the men who claimed to have been the Legislature of that State were not elected. Ah, Mr. President, the time may come when parties in this Chamber may not be so willing to come to such decisions upon such superficial inquiry. The time may come when the electoral vote of some of your States may hang in the balance, and that balance may determine who shall preside over the administration of the affairs of this Government for a presidential term. Will you then be so ready to act upon a presumption that such and such men were not elected? I think not; and I ask you now, with all the establishment of the authority of this Government, with all that it has done in that State, with all the consequences financially to many citizens of this counthat was not a valid Legislature, and consequently that all its act are invalid; or will you admit this man, as you have admitted others over and over again, and will again admit still others, and let him take his seat upon the floor, and then pursue your inquiry, a proper take his seat upon the floor, and then pursue your inquiry, a proper one, and in accordance with your power, and in accordance with your duty, pursue an inquiry as to his title? There is nothing before this Senate against him. There is a report here, never verified by the Senate, never adopted by the Senate, repudiated to-day by every member that made it, denied by every member that made it, denied by every member that made it, and upon that report, and upon that evidence, so hurried, so superficial, and so little relating to the matter at issue, you would say that we have no Legislature in the State of Louisiana; we have no governor; all the acts of that body, all the constitutional amendments that were propounded by it, and submitted by it to the people of Louisiana, and approved by them, involving an interest of something like $20,000,000, all that goes for naught upon this report, which is repudiated by its

Mr. President, I do not desire to go into the features of this case. I will not detain the Senate longer. I did not expect even to say this much; but the proposition we had here submitted to us yesterday, that a congressional committee of 1872 of the Forty-second Congress could decide a man's seat in the Forty-third or Forty-fourth

Congress, was something so extraordinary that I thought the Senate's attention ought to be attracted to it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, if the issue in this case had been made up on the relative claims of Mr. Pinchback and Mr. McMillen, (whose credentials were quite recently withdrawn from the files of the Senate,) or if the contest was between Mr. Pinchback and Mr. Eustis, as I understand the pretensions of the latter, and I was absolutely compelled to make a choice between them, I should certainly vote for Mr. Pinchback, under the rule that of two evils one should vote for Mr. Pinchback, under the rule that of two evils one should choose the lesser. But, sir, as it is mainly an issue between Mr. Pinchback and the law, I shall vote for the law as I understand it. Albeit, Mr. President, I have not arisen to make a legal argument. That would indeed, sir, be a work of supererogation on my part after the weary years of very able discussion that have already been given to this question. I shall not so consume the time nor so abuse the patience of the Senate. I desire only to say a few brief words in a spirit of the utmost kindness, sincerity, and candor to my republican brethren in the Senate, and out of it as well.

ren in the Senate, and out of it as well.

In my opinion, sir, the republican party will not be strengthened by the admission of Mr. Pinchback under the election upon which he bases his claim. A suspicion—almost a conviction, sir—pervades the public mind everywhere that his election was altogether a farce. Indeed, sir, very many republicans, some of them in this Chamber, more of them outside, who have carefully examined all the law and all the evidence, anxious to discover therein the proper warrant of authority for Mr. Pinchback's admission to a seat in this body, have been forced to the conclusion that it cannot be found. Moreover, sir, the whole case is so closely related extrinsically to a condition of political affairs in Louisiana which is admitted on all hands to be so deplorable, while in and of itself it has so few of the elements which the people are sure to require before they give to it their approval, and it is, withal, immediately environed by complications so unrepublican in character, that in my humble judgment we had better let it alone entirely. I say this, sir, with the utmost deference for the opinions of the very able and patriotic Senators here who think otherwise. And, sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood that in what I may say upon this question I disclaim utterly any intention to impugn the motives or to criticise the action of any Senator upon this floor. I accord to all what I claim for myself: a conscientious desire to discharge faithfully an important public duty.

But, sir, judging for myself only, I cannot resist the conviction that republican Senators will not be multiplied in this Chamber if, under the plea of party necessity, as made by our Louisiana friends in this Mr. Pinchback or any other man claiming a seat here shall be admitted through methods at least questionable; methods which very many conscientious and thoughtful republicans in all sections of the country may think to be in contravention of law.

It should not be forgotten, sir, that the people do never patiently endure what they may even suspect to be an abuse of power, although for the moment such abuse may appear to be the only remedy for other evils of greater degree. I speak generally, sir. I present only certain notable characteristics of our people, of our party, and I sim-ply ask Senators to remember them while they recall and reflect upon the original elements in this case with all their attendant complications. The people, sir, admire genuine manhood in the individual; they demand its fullest aggregation and development in a political they demand its fullest aggregation and development in a political party. They scorn and detest every appearance of political scheming and strategy, even when resorted to in the apparent interest of the party to which they themselves are attached, and they quickly, very quickly, repudiate the men who lend themselves to such pursuits. The republican party long ago learned this useful lesson. In truth, sir, the very organization itself had its conception in the demand of the people for a party of such superior moral excellence that it must, from the very nature of its formation and its existence, conform its policies to the strictest ethical rules. Hence its wonderful growth: hence its immortal achievements. It can no more perpetugrowth; hence its immortal achievements. It can no more perpetuate its power, sir, by permitting itself to fall from the high standard itself has fixed than could the animal and the vegetable life of the world continue if the light and the warming influence of the sun were withdrawn. It cannot justify itself unto itself for the performance of unrepublican acts by the fact that the democratic party in Louisiana and elsewhere has been guilty of great political crimes. To at-tempt this, sir, would be to imperil its own existence. It must affirm and defend the right for the sake of the right everywhere, and punish through and by the law political and other crimes wherever and by whomsoever committed. It cannot plead political set-offs for the derelictions charged against itself; it cannot content itself with party reprisals for the offenses or the crimes of its opponents. By its own acts alone will it be judged at the bar of public opinion, and receive the approval or the condemnation of the people as it may deserve.

And I will say in this connection, parenthetically, that the intelligent masses who compose the republican party demand always that the work of self-purification shall be continuously and thoroughly prosecuted by the party. Their approval of all honest, earnest efforts in that behalf by their chosen officers, and their condemnation of all corrupt practices, are emphatic and universal. The assistance of political opponents is gladly accepted, however deep the stain upon their garments, when such aid can be usefully employed for the punishment of unfaithful officials to whom the party has given place and power. And now, sir, I repeat what I have before substantially said, I do not believe we ought to undertake a contest with the democratic party even when invited thereto in Louisiana for the championship in transeven when invited thereto in Louisiana for the championship in transgressions of the law. Nor do I think, sir, that we can afford to retaliate here for the alleged revolutionary acts of that party in that State by admitting at this time to this the highest legislative body in the nation a man elected under such circumstances as those to which I have adverted. I do not think, sir, that we will thereby have strengthened our claim for the popular favor.

Mr. President, I am equally firm in the opinion that the admission of Mr. Pinchback will not conserve the best interests of the colored people, for whom I have the warmest regard and sympathy. I affirm, sir, that the negroes have not generally manifested a disposition to arrogate to themselves powers and privileges not conferred upon them through and by the boon of citizenship. On the contrary, I insist that they have as a rule deported themselves with becoming modesty; and I consider it to be of vital importance to them that they continue to maintain this rule of conduct throughout; that they make no attempt anywhere to assume the offensive in the unfortunate struggle in which they are involved; that they themselves keep carefully within the law in order that their claim for protection against those who violate it to their injury may be readily recognized and responded to by the whole country. They can make no greater and responded to by the whole country. They can make no greater mistake, sir, than to insist that the republican party, their natural ally and friend, shall take part with them in aggressive political movements which may be attended by many irregularities and surrounded by which may be attended by many irregularities and surrounded by illegal complications. The supremacy of the republican party, sir, must depend altogether upon the acceptability of its policies to the intelligent and the law-abiding people of the great North. They, sir, will give much, very much, to the colored people of the South for defensive, but nothing for offensive warfare. They will yield everything for the protection of their lives, their liberties, their property, when satisfied that they are in danger, but nothing whatever to a crusade for political aggrandizement. Such, sir, is the full scope of the authority given by the people to the republican party in respect of such matters. A single step beyond it will destroy that party forever.

The colored people, sir, sometimes complain of the President—than whom they have no better friend—because, forsooth, he refuses to employ, unlawfully, the military power of the Government on occasions which seem to him to be purely political. And yet, if he should comply with these demands, the reactionary influence of such intervention upon northern sentiment would be infinitely more disastrous to all the interests of these people than the evils they would thus temporarily remedy. Festina lente—learn to make haste slowly—is an injunction full of practical significance and utility for our colored friends. They should strive always to remember that the elevation of a race long in servitude is only accomplished through slow and painful processes. Who will deny, sir, that the sudden transformation of the re-cently disinthralled negroes of the South to a permanent domination in governmental affairs, when the relative conditions of the two classes thus to exchange places are considered, would be an unheard of anomaly in history? Mr. President, a full and satisfactory adjustment of the new relations of the freedmen with their former masters cannot be made in a day, nor yet in a year; perhaps, sir, not during the life of the present generation. That such adjustment must, in the very nature of things, be attended for a considerable period of time with serious, social, and political disturbances, is inevitable. But, sir, if the negroes themselves perform faithfully all the duties of citizenship, and yet are persistently refused the enjoyment of all the rights, the privileges, and the immunities thereof, a great power of moral sentiment will one day rise up in support of the republican party, which will enable that party not only to demand but to see to it that these blessings are secured to the colored people in their fullest degree. Sir, it is because I think such acts as the admission of Mr. Pinchback, under the circumstances in which he is placed, will complicate affairs between the two races, and rather retard than help to develop such a sentiment as I have defined, that I advise the colored people, too, to let his case alone entirely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything upon this question; but it seems of too vital importance to let it go by without an explanation of the vote which I shall

That there is some doubt about the question is apparent from the action, or rather the non-action, of the Senate itself. If it had been clear that a Senator should be admitted from Louisiana, he ought to have been admitted about three years ago. That implies at once that there is some doubt about the question. I know that it is said here that many of the members of the committee that made the large report upon the evidence in the Louisiana case, of which we have heard so much, have changed their opinions, and are now going to vote dif-ferent from the tenor of their report; but I have yet to be informed that the change of opinion of any one of the members who made this report changes a single fact contained in the book; not one of them has been changed since the report was made, and the "organized fraud of the largest dimensions" is as much a fact to-day as when it was asserted at the outset by one of the members of this

Mr. President, I have often, as we all have, had occasion to admire the great ability and pertinacity of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] who has so frequently addressed the Senate upon this sub-ject; and but for the ability of that distinguished Senator, in my judgment this case would now have no place in the Senate.

We are made the exclusive judges of the election of members of this body; and if the people cannot rely upon us to discharge that duty with the utmost fidelity, it seems to me that we have taken a long step toward the destruction of the estimation in which this body has hitherto been held. For one, I am not ready to accept of the doings of the Louisiana so-called legislature as the natural and legitimate outgrowth of republican institutions; and so far as my vote is concerned, I shall not accept the action of that pretended legislature in this case, or of any other under similar circumstances. that it is argued here that this case should be decided upon the prima facie evidence of the certificate of the governor; but, Mr. President, when we know that the election is in fact a fraud, shall we accept it on its prima facie evidence? Suppose that a note was signed for $100 with a fraudulent signature, is the supposed promiser of that note bound to pay it on the face of it when he knows it is a fraud? Just as much and no more than we are to admit a Senator on prima facie

In regard to this Louisiana report, not one of the members of the committee that made the report then pretended to favor the election of any Senator from Louisiana, not even the Senator from Indiana; and if Ray and McMillen, who were certainly white republicans, could not be admitted, how could Mr. Pinchback, elected by the same legisnot be admitted, now could Mr. Pinenback, elected by the same legislature, receive the approbation of that committee or of the Senate? In my judgment, the great question here for us depends or seems to depend upon the color of the applicant. It is a color of title; and that is all. If he had been a white republican, I do not believe that this case would have remained in the Senate for the great length of time it has done; and I say this with entire respect to the colored race. I think they are entitled in this body, having four millions of people in this country, to some representatives here, and I look forward to the time when there will be representatives of the colored ward to the time when there will be representatives of the colored race here, and such representatives in point of ability and eloquence as Senators will be proud to hail as their peers. I have no prejudice on the subject of color except in its favor.

I am disposed to look at this question with some reference to the future, and I am free to say that let any Senator come here from a State in such a revolutionary or disorganized condition as Louisiana is in, I would vote to reject him as a member of this body. I do not believe that all of the Southern States outside of Louisiana are to-day competent to elect Senators, and so far as my vote is concerned, if the question should arise, I should vote to exclude them. The republican party was founded upon a question touching the purity of elections. In 1855 and 1856 we made the warfare against the democratic party for frauds in the elections in Kansas; and the difference between that case and this is that here the frauds redound to our benefit, in that case to the benefit of the democratic party. In saying this I do not mean to say that I believe that if a fair vote had been taken in Louisiana the republican party would not have succeeded. I believe they would; but so far as the facts are concerned, the returns made, the action of Judge Durell there, the whole of it looks to me like a stu-pendous fraud, and so far as my vote is concerned I shall vote against receiving any Senator from that State, whether he is a republican or a democrat.

It seems to me that we can hardly afford to adopt this as a precedent to rule for all time. Suppose that on any other occasion a faction in any State should succeed in getting a Senator elected under like circumstances of force and fraud with the present, would the Senate be in favor of admitting a Senator under such circumstances Senate be in favor of admitting a Senator under such circumstances from any other State? I cannot believe that they would. Certainly in this case my convictions of duty are clear. If it were a mere matter of expediency, I should certainly go where I suppose a majority of my friends will go; but this question rises higher than a mere question of expediency. It is a question of principle, a question that relates to the dignity and stability of this body, and as such I shall vote on this occasion against the proposition to admit Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, until a few moments ago I had not intended to speek again on this question affect the discussion I had given tended to speak again on this question after the discussion I had given it on previous occasions; but I do not feel like sitting here and being lectured by a republican on account of the vote I shall cast. The vote that I shall cast in this instance shall be cast because I believe that the current of authorities entitles this man to his seat; and I will try at least in a very few moments to demonstrate that fact, if I can do so. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Paddock] has given us notice that if this man is admitted it will be purely on the ground of politics, or as a matter of political action on the part of those who vote for his admission, and he reads us a moral lecture on that subject.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think any statement made by me would be open to such a construction.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall not undertake to criticise the argument of the Senator, but if there was any point in his argument, that was the only one that I discovered. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morritte] also is inclined to bring a bill of indictment against the committee that reported once against the frauds in Louisiana, and therefore he demands of the Senate that Louisiana shall not have reprefore he demands of the Senate that Louisiana shall not have representation. According to my idea of the theory of government, of this Government at least, and according to the Constitution of the United States, each State is entitled to representation on this floor. Each State is entitled to two Senators as representatives of the people of the State. This being a provision of the Constitution, the State is expected to comply with it, and the Government is expected to recognize that right as belonging to one of the sister States when she asks for representation on the floor of Congress.

First, then, what is a State? A State is an organized community, under the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognize that the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognized that the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognized the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognized the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognized that the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and recognized that the constitution is constitution.

under the constitution as prescribed by those who framed it and rec ognized by the people, having constitutional relations with the Government of the United States. Is Louisiana a State? Circumscribed by the boundaries that are provided by law, having in her limits the requisite population, having a character of government, acting under a form and acting under a constitution recognized by the Government of the United States as republican in form, being in relations with the General Government, she is a State to all intents and purposes as contemplated by the Constitution of our country. How, then, is she entemplated by the Constitution of our country. How, then, is she entitled to representation? She is entitled to representation when she presents that representation according to the forms of law and in consonance with the precedents that have been established for the protection of government, either State or national.

Again we find the Constitution providing that—

The United State

shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

Who shall guarantee a republican form of government? The United States of America. How? By the action of the departments of government, the only mode that is prescribed by which a State shall have a republican form of government guaranteed to it. It then becomes the duty of the Government of the United States to guarantee a form of government to a State, that is of a republican character. If, then, the State is in a condition of revolution or anarchy or confuthen, the State is in a condition of revolution or anarchy or confusion, it becomes the duty of the Government of the United States to exercise its power for the purpose of carrying out that guarantee provided in the Constitution under which we exist as a Government. If I am correct in this proposition laid down as a basis for my argument, I desire to travel along and take up the next question. What is it? Is Louisiana a State? If so, is it a State republican in form? If not, has the Government of the United States carried out the guarantee that it is bound to do in the Constitution? If so, then she is entitled to representation on this floor. How representation? Representation according to the forms, according to the rules, according to the decisions of our courts, and according to the precedents of our Government. It is said that because of frauds in the election there can be no government there; in other words, that no Senator from that State is entitled to a seat on this floor. If no Senator is entitled to a seat on this floor from the State of Louisiana, then her government is not acting according to the forms of the Constitution, and is ment is not acting according to the forms of the Constitution, and is not republican in form. But, forsooth, I am told that because of the character of one department of that State government it is not republican in form. The character of what? The character of the Legislature; that that Legislature having not been elected according to law, as is maintained by some, it never can become a lawful body, and therefore the State can never have representation on this floor. Let us examine this question for a moment. We are told that the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a report against the legality of the election of Mr. Ray and Mr. McMillen; "white republicans," says my friend from Vermont, [Mr. Morrill.] If Mr. McMillen was a republican, either white or black, I never heard of its before. It is said because of that report we cannot recognize the arise report of that Legislature. When that committee made their report to the Senate they reported a bill with it. For what purpose? A bill was reported to the Senate of the United States demanding that this Government should express its authority for the senate of the United States demanding that this Government should exercise its authority for the purpose of carrying out the guarantee in the Constitution so as to make that State republican in form; but the Senate refused to enact it into a law. The Senate refused to recognize the fact that no government existed in the State of Louisiana, and refused to adopt any bill or any measure under the guarantee clause of the Constitution of the United States.

What then is left for us to do? It is left then to examine the question whether or not there is any mode or manner prescribed by law by which this State can have representation in the Congress of the United States. I maintain that when the State government of Louisiana has been recognized by all the departments of Government, when the claimant asking a seat as a Senator presents a certificate of the governor recognized by this Government as the governor of Louisiana, he has a prima facie case to a seat in the Senate, and you are bound to allow him to take the oath of office, and afterward make your inquiries, if any are to be made. Then let us see whether or not there is

Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a certain condition of things the President is required to recognize a certain condition of things the President is required to recognize one or the other of the pretended governments as a government for the purpose of carrying on the relations between the General Government and the States. Mr. Kellogg has been recognized as governor of Louisiana, the opinion of my friend from Michigan [Mr. Christiana, the President of the United States and by both Houses of Congress. Am I not correct in this? The Senator says that no such recognition has been given. I will not read to the Senate, because every one here is conversant with the fact. No one disputes or doubts but what the government and the Legislature of Louisiana were recognition.

but what the government and the Legislature of Louisiana were recognized by the President of the United States. There is no dispute upon that point. All know that to be the fact. Then my friend from npon that point. All know that to be the fact. Then my friend from Michigan says that the Congress of the United States have not recognized either the governor or the Legislature of Louisana elected in 1872. The other branch of Congress has recognized the governor of Louisiana from the time he first had the oath of office administered to him. His certificate has been the password for every member who has been elected from Louisiana to the House of Representatives from that day to this. Then, has the Senate recognized the governor of Louisiana? At the last session of this body the Senate of the United States passed the following resolution: States passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government of Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence and in enforcing the laws of the United States in that State is approved.

What is approved? The action of the President.

In doing what? In recognizing the government in Louisiana over which William P. Kellogg presides as the executive of that State. But my friend from Michigan says that is not a recognition of Kellogg. If it is not a recognition of Kellogg, I should like my friend from Michigan to tell me what it is a recognition of. It is a recognition of the state of the nition of something.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator wishes a reply, I will give it. I stated yesterday that it was a recognition of the governor in fact, exercising the power of governor, but not recognizing his right as governor de jure.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah! Let us read again and see whether the Senator is correct or not.

That the action of the President in protecting-in protecting the government in Louisiana-

So you see it is a government. What kind of a government? A State government.

of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive.

That is what the resolution says.

What is "the executive?" We did not say "executive in fact;"

we say "the executive."
Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but-

Mr. LOGAN. It is no interruption at all.
Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As he asks me the question, I will answer it. I had, I thought, sufficiently answered it already. No one has ever denied, I have not denied, and I do not think any Senator here has denied, that there was a government in Louisiana. The original resolution of the Senator from Indiana declared the legality of that government expressly. This resolution said nothing upon that point government expressly. This resolution said nothing upon that point whatever; simply recognized a government existing de facto, and said nothing of the question of right or wrong.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. Neither the words "de facto" nor "de jure" are to be found in the resolution. It says "the executive," not "the executive de facto," not "the executive de jure," but "the executive" of the State. That is what the resolution says, and that is what the Senator voted for. I put this question to the Senator from Michigan: If we as Senators indorsed the President of the United States in recognizing William P. Kellogga as governor without ator from Michigan: If we as Senators indorsed the President of the United States in recognizing William P. Kellogg as governor without a de jure or de facto qualification and then turn around and say that he is not governor, what did we indorse the President for doing? We indorsed the President for doing an illegal, unconstitutional act; and that is the position the Senator from Michigan occupies.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have no other answer to make to that question than to refer the Senator to the explanation which I made at the time the vote was given, which was not contested or disputed by any Senator here; and I will further express the opinion that the reason why it was not was that the Senator himself and the friends of that why it was not was that the Senator himself and the friends of that resolution knew that if it was claimed to mean what it is now claimed resolution knew that if it was claimed to mean what it is now claimed to mean it would never have passed the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I know nothing about that, and I care nothing about it. I am speaking of the fact. What induced the Senator to vote for or against it is none of my business and I know nothing about it; but I know he voted for it, and I know what it says, and I know the position he now occupies is that he voted to sustain the President for doing an illegal and unconstitutional act. That is all there is in it; that is his registion and no many care got away from it. that is his position, and no man can get away from it. I propose to say that the President did not do an unlawful and unconstitutional act, and I voted for it because I believed Kellogg was governor. Let me say why I believed it. I think about as good a thing as we can do in this matter is to follow the laws as we have them written and the laws as they are expounded. Now, sir, I desire only for a few moments to call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on precisely this point. The very question that is being discussed in the Senate to-day has been passed upon by the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court has recognized the action that we ourselves propose to take here to-day. The Supreme Court has decided-

The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of that State; and the well-settled rule in this court is, that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of the State.

The Supreme Court have advised us that the decisions of the State courts on the constitutions and laws of the State are the rules that will be followed by the Supreme Court and all the courts of the United States. Then has this case been decided? I have the decisions here, but I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate by reading them. I state the fact to be that by two decisions of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana they have recognized as laws of that State acts passed by this legislature; they have recognized the condition of things as it is. By deciding the constitutionality and legality of the laws of that State so passed they have recognized the Legislature of the State and the approving governor of the State who signed the bills.

Then we find that the Supreme Court of the United States go further. In speaking of the two governments in the State of Rhode Island, where two separate governments attempted at least to exist, the Supreme Court speak of them in this way:

Under this article of the Constitution-

Speaking of the guarantee clause-

it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Sanators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

Speaking again of the condition of things in Rhode Island, the Supreme Court say:

By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature.

There is the decision of the Supreme Court expressly in the case of Luther vs. Borden that the President of the United States, to determine this question, must recognize one or the other, and that when he recognizes one it is in fact a recognition of its character as a lawful body, and this applies to either the governor or the Legislature. Then by the act of the President, by the act of the other branch of Congress, and by the action of this branch of Congress in recognizing Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisana, he has had all the recognitions that either Constitution or law or the decision of any court of the United States requires for the purpose of determining whether a Senator or a member of Congress has a prima facie case on his certificate

If I had time to read it, but I have not, for I do not wish to detain the Senate, I could quote from a case decided by this body that arose in Rhode Island, the case of Potter vs. Robbins. Robbins was elected after the Legislature had extended its own time for one year, and he was elected by that Legislature. Afterward Potter was elected by the succeeding Legislature. The question arose as to which one was legally elected, whether by the first or the second act of the two different Legislatures. There the same question arose precisely that arises in this case as to the recognition of the government and the power of the Legislature, and whether or not that was the lawful Legislature the Legislature, and whether or not that was the lawful Legislature which was recognized by the courts of the State. By an examination of that case you will find the very same rule laid down, that where the courts of the State recognize the existence of a legislature by acting under their laws and by executing process which is being enforced under their laws, it is thereby recognized as the lawful Legislature. Mr. Robbins got his seat on that very ground.

These, then, are parallel cases. There is a precedent fixed by the Senate itself, following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in almost a similar case, deciding that to ascertain what is the lawful Legislature you look to the action of the courts in enforcing the laws that they have enacted, and the decisions of the forcing the laws that they have enacted, and the decisions of the courts of the State determine the question as to which is the lawful legislative body, and the Congress of the United States will follow that decision. The Senate of the United States in that case followed this rule, and placed Mr. Robbins in his seat instead of Mr. Potter.

Mr. President, I stated that I would occupy but a very short time, for I have discussed this question before until I am tired of it. I have discussed it when these decisions were all read and noted and understood by the Senate. That has been also done divers and sundry times by other Senators here. But I must say that it does seem strange to me that the republicans, or a portion of them, are such poor lawyers, and the democrats are all so good; they always have the law on their side, or at least so that they can all vote one way; but strange to say, we cannot. I suppose it is on account of the superiority of our wisdom—I cannot understand it in any other way—wisdom that makes men have opinions and causes them to differ with one another. I am willing to accord that great wisdom to our two friends from Vermont and to our friend from Nebraska and all the other Senators on this side of the House who think this is merely a political question, merely to be voted for because of politics. I do not care what the man's politics are or what his complexion may be. I say to my friend from Nebraska to-day, if this man had been a white man he would have been in here long ago.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I was not here long ago, and therefore am not able to say whether his statement is correct or not.

Mr. LOGAN. If you had been here for forty years perhaps you could not tell whether it was correct or not except as to yourself.

Mr. PADDOCK. I could try.
Mr. LOGAN. That is my deliberate opinion about it, at least, that his color has much to do with his admission to a seat in this body.

Mr. PADDOCK. None whatever with me.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not addressing the Senator; I do not say it has with him, but I will make my language apply generally. I do not see why he should object to color any more than I would.

Mr. PADDOCK. It was because my friend had made a reference to me just before that I deemed it proper to make the disclaimer.

Mr. LOGAN. I was looking to the Senator, I know; but I was referring to the case, not to an individual. I was referring to the case of Pinchback. It is a colored case. That is the objection to it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am rather an admirer of color.

Mr. LOGAN. Now let us see whether I am correct or not in saying that this man is kept out on account of his color. Here is the case of Senator Spencer, from Alabama. There were two legislatures in session at the time he was elected, just precisely as in Mr. Pinchback's Of these two legislatures one was called the State-house, and one the court-house legislature, and each claimed to be the Legislature of the State of Alabama. The Legislature that elected Senator Spencer met in the court-house and not in the State-house, where they were expected to meet; but Senator Spencer had the certificate of the governor of Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the election of the true Legislature besides, which is of some account.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad that the Senator has made that suggestion. How did he ascertain that fact?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Just as I ascertained who the Legislature was that elected my friend, or he did who the Legislature was that elected

Mr. LOGAN. I will tell the Senator how he ascertained it: Mr. Spencer presented his certificate of election at the desk, and he was sworn in.

Mr. MORTON. I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the question which was the proper Legislature was not decided for over six months after.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going to come to that. I was going to tell my friend from Vermont how we ascertained that it was the right Legislature. We ascertained it after Mr. Spencer had taken his seat in this body and after the Committee on Privileges and Elections had examined the question and reported that he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama. That was the way he ascertained it, and not at the time that he presented his certificate.

Mr. MORTON. Nearly a year afterward.
Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. Now I ask my friends here to-day, full of legal lore as they are, how it is that a duplicate legislature in Alabama can be determined as to the rightfulness of one body on the certificate of a Senator from that State, but it cannot be determined on the certificate of a Senator from Louisiana? One was white; the other was black. That is the reason. I know the laws have never been applied in this country equally to the white and the colored races. I do not know whether they ever will be or not. God knows they ought to be. The time has been in this country when the prejudice against color was so deeply rooted in our composition that we were never able to divest ourselves of that prejudice. The law has never borne equally upon all people in this land, and perhaps never will. When the blacks were slaves and in chains, the law was unequally applied to the different races. Since the manacles have dropped from their limbs by the strong arm of this nation fighting for the preserva-tion of the Constitution and all that was guaranteed to us under it, it is still hard for us to divest ourselves of a prejudice that once had grown in us; and to such an extent does it exist that an argument is made that one man is entitled to his seat on a prima facie case on the certificate of the governor of his State, he being a white man, and he is admitted; and when a colored man comes with the same status precisely, he is rejected, and reasons are given, but they are different reasons from those that find their basis and their root in our composition. It is perfectly natural for these prejudices to outcrop in argument; not that they ever show themselves against the race, but we naturally read the law differently when we come to construe it as applicable to one man and as applicable to another.

But we have been told, and I suppose we shall be again, that this election was reeking with fraud. Nobody denies that; nobody doubts it; nobody ever has doubted it. Not only was it reeking with fraud, but the fraud was so great that even forged returns were made and the committee reported against the election of either party and asked Congress to provide a government. Congress refused to provide a government; but under the Constitution and by virtue of the invested in the President, he recognized one government elected there, as it was his duty to do.

Mr. EATON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. Mr. EATON. I desire in reference to an argument that the Senator has just been making in regard to color to ask him one question; and that is, was there any objection made by any Senator to the admission of the colored Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LOGAN. No, there was not because no objection could possibly be raised. Mr. EATON.

Then color has nothing to do with it.

The Senator will allow me to correct him. The Sen-Mr. LOGAN. ator from Mississippi was elected by the only Legislature in the State, the only one claiming to be or pretending to be; hence no basis for an objection could be found. Therefore he was allowed to be sworn in. But I am trying to draw the parallel between the case of Alabama, where two legislatures existed, and the case of Louisiana where two legislatures existed; and one happened to elect a white Senator and the other happened to elect a colored Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend refers to the Alabama case as if we had there done something which is inconsistent with what we are asked to do now or with what I wish to have done. I desire to call his attention to the Journal of the Senate. On the 7th of March, 1873, on the very day when the Spencer matter was disposed of

Mr. West presented the credentials of William L. McMillen, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1873.

On a prior day the credentials of Mr. Ray were presented, which were credentials coming from Mr. Kellogg, as these of Mr. Pinchback were credentials coming from Mr. Kellogg, as these of Mr. Pinchback do, and under the same seal and under an election by the same body of men within a day or two, as we all know, or at the same time, one election for the short term by our legislature, as I will call it, and one for the long term. Now will my friend explain to us if the cases are alike, or were understood to be alike, how it happened that we unanimously sent the Louisiana credentials of Ray and McMillen to his committee for inquiry, and by a strong vote swore in Mr. Spencer on his credentials? If the cases were alike, why did we take that different course? ferent course?

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps the Senator can explain that himself. He asks me. He had a vote the same as I had, and perhaps he can explain why he did it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot explain it. I was unhappily ill and was of Ray and McMillen were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I presume that every one who was here then knows the reason why. They were in a state of revolution there in that State, and the matter was referred to the committee to inquire whether or not there was a State government, and to provide means for getting one if there was not, as I stated in the outset of my argument ting one if there was not, as I stated in the outset of my argument to-day, under the clause guaranteeing a republican form of government to the States to take measures to that end. I suppose that was the reason that actuated every Senator; but, as I said, when we reported a bill and asked Senators to provide a government for Louisiana it was voted down. Thus the Senate decided that a government existed there. That was the decision of the Senate. The Senate so decided by voting down our conclusion. It decided thereby that a government did exist, and it has been so decided since that time. That being the case I should like to know why we should say now that being the case, I should like to know why we should say now that a government does not exist there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not disturb the Senator—

Mr. LOGAN. It is no disturbance at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call his attention to what I believe was the fact in respect of the bill reported by his committee; that that bill, as was understood by everybody—I do not know that there is any way of proving it by the record—commanded the support of a majority of this body. It was amended on the motion, I think, of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] to provide that during the period of interval between the passage of the bill and the completion of riod of interval between the passage of the bill and the completion of the new election, Mr. Kellogg should be the acting governor of that State, and should have the power to execute the law. I do not remember the details; that was the purpose. That amendment was agreed to; and that, as was understood, and I suppose universally, at the time, killed the bill. It would have passed but for that.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference what killed the bill; it is not a question as to what killed the bill. The question is, if Congress did not provide a government, and declined to do it, did it not recognize thereby that government which existed there?

mize thereby that government which existed there?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Vermont inquired why it was that the credentials signed by Mr. Kellogg of Ray were referred, and the credentials signed by the governor of Alabama of Mr. Spencer were not referred. At the time those credentials came up there was a dispute asto whether Mr. Kellogg was the governor of Louisiana or not; there was no dispute in the case of the governor of Alabama; but this dispute in regard to Kellogg has since been settled that he was the governor of Louisiana by every department of this Government, and the dispute is at an end.

Mr. LOGAN. On the point that I was discussing with my friend from Vermont, in reference to the question as to why these credentials were referred, I have tried at least to answer his suggestion. The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in reference to the Louisiana question, made in February, 1873, is to my mind entirely out of the case. I say so, because where there is a difference on a question of the case. tion arising in a State as to which is the legitimate government of the State, under the Constitution there is and can be but one mode of deciding that question. Where two persons claim to be governor, and where of two legislatures each claims to be the legitimate and lawful legislature, there must be some tribunal to which the question may or can be referred; that tribunal's decision must be or at least ought to be recognized by ourselves to such an extent as to allow the machinery of that government to move on. Now let me put a case. We insist that a State cannot go out of this Union. At the same time we insist that we may deprive a State of representation. The two cannot go together. If a State is in the Union she is entitled to repre-The two cansentation; and whenever all the forms are complied with that are requisite to determine that question as to whether it is a State having a legislature, and as to whether that legislature has performed its a legislature, and as to whether that legislature has performed its duty in such a manner as will be recognized by the authorities empowered to make the recognition, we can inquire no further. You may call the Legislature of Louisiana revolutionary; you may call the government revolutionary; but it is immaterial to this issue. There must be a starting-point to all governments. When a revolutionary government establishes itself, there must be a point of recognition. What is that point of recognition? The point of recognition, so far as the lawful authority of a legislature is concerned or of the governor of a State, is that time and point when the laws of the State. ernor of a State, is that time and point when the laws of the State passed by that legislature and signed by that governor are recognized, enforced, and executed.

The laws of Louisiana passed by this Legislature, signed by this gov ernor, have been and are recognized by the courts of that State, by all the officers of that State, are being executed in all their parts by the executive authority of that State, have been recognized by the judicial authority as being constitutional and such laws as should be enforced. If the Legislature of Louisiana has not this recognition, every law passed by it is void, every act under its laws is void, every execution of a criminal for a murder under those laws makes the man that executes him a murderer. There have been in Louisiana commissions issued by the governor which have been recognized, alleged criminals have been pardoned, convicted criminals have been executed by his authority under the laws passed by this Legislature, recognized by the courts of that State, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that it must follow the decisions of the courts of the State in reference to the constitution and the laws enacted thereunder.

them as not binding. Then the entire State of Louisiana, according to the theory enunciated by Senators here, is in chaos and confusion and there is no government whatever there. Why, sir, the history of all governments teaches us different from that.

Another point I would like to put to my friends from Vermont, Nebraska, and other States who disagree with me on this question: When the next President shall be elected, who will certify to the electors of Louisiana? What do my friends propose in the next presidential election? The electors elected in the State of Louisiana next November have to be certified by the governor of the State. What governor are you going to recognize as certifying to that fact I should like my friends to tell me now, are you going to recognize the certificate of McEnery, the revolutionary governor that has been driven out with his mob and has failed to compete for the governorabandoned by its friends and disbanded so far as they are concerned themselves? Is that what you are going to do? Are you going to allow the next presidential election perhaps to turn upon this very question undecided here in the Senate, on the certificates that are iven to the electors in the State of Louisiana? If that certificate of kellogg is not good enough to give a Senator a seat prima facie, it is not good enough to give an elector the right to vote for President. The principle is the same, and I asked Senators the other day to think at least on what they are doing before they act. I remember very well when under the joint rules of the Senate and the House States were excluded by Congress from having a vote in the electoral col-lege. Arkansas was excluded on account of the alleged informality of a seal, because no debate was allowed in the Senate, the examination could not be made so as to satisfy the Senate whether it was ation could not be made so as to satisfy the Senate whether it was the proper seal of the State or not, and the vote was excluded. Much greater is the reason for excluding the vote in this case if the theories of these Senators are to obtain in this body, that the certificate of the governor of the State of Louisiana is of no avail whatever because he is not governor. Now I should like my friend from Michigan to tell me what would be his decision in that case?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have not been listening to what the Senator has been saying for a few minutes. I have been otherwise engaged.

Mr. LOGAN. The point is this: The election of electors of President and Vice-President is certified by the governor.
Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I suppose their election could be shown if there were no governor to certify to them.
Mr. LOGAN. If there was no proclamation issued by the governor for holding the election, how would the people hold the election? The elections in Louisiana are held now under provisions enacted by this very Legislature that you say is not a legal body. The governor issues his proclamation for an election on a certain day. My friend says they can count them without any governor. Without a governor is sues his proclamation for an election on a certain day. My friend says they can count them without any governor. Without a governor it would not be a State, it would not be recognized as a State; the Senator knows it. He refuses to recognize it now as a State, because he says it has no governor. But he says you can count the electoral vote without a governor. That is a new doctrine to me.

Mr CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

question ?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I believe he was of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that made the report which has been so often quoted?

Mr. LOGAN.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have been informed that the Senator after that report favored a bill for an election in the State of Louisiana which disregarded entirely Mr. Kellogg's election as governor, and thereby recognized that the State was without a legal government.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is a little mistaken in that.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Perhaps I am.

Mr. LOGAN. He is a little mistaken as to how I voted on that bill. But the committee reported the bill, and the Senate refused to enact it, thereby declaring that there was an existing government, because they refused to institute a government. But I would like the Senator to tell me, and all the Senators to tell me, what they are going to do with the electors. That is an important question. I may be elected President myself; who can tell? or the Senator from Michigan may be. [Laughter.] We should like to have Louisiana

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If that contingency should happen in the case of my friend from Illinois, I promise to find him a law which will authorize the vote of Louisiana to be counted.

Mr. LOGAN. That is, you think you will have time to enact the law between now and then.
Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Undoubtedly.
Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt of that myself. You would find law enough. You would be so much in favor of having yourself counted in that you would find a law anyhow, whether it was good or not and I presume we should be all of us so inclined. [Laughter.] This is a strange condition of things; it is an anomalous condition of things. It reminds me a good deal of the story I once heard of the Indian and white man who went out hunting and killed a turkey and Now let us go a little further. By the action attempted to be forced by this Senate, you recognize the governor as a murderer, the jurors as murderers, the State laws as nullities, contracts existing under turkey, or I will take the turkey and you may take the buzzard."

That is the condition now. The Indian said, "That is all right, but you never say turkey to me once." [Laughter.] It is all right to count the electoral vote next fail, provided it helps elect your candidate; but it is all wrong to count the certificate now, because it puts a colored man in the Senate. That is the point exactly. It is all first rate if it is on your side. If next fall the people should elect a man you do not like, I suppose you would swear there was no government there at all, and, therefore, would not count the electoral vote; but if they happen to elect a man you want, you will say there is gov-ernment enough to count the votes.

mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will say that I have never been in the habit of changing my vote or my opinion on the ground of the election of a candidate on one side or the other. I do not propose to adopt such a principle of action. If the Senator can refer to any instance in which I have shown a disposition to do that he will certainly accommodate me, because I am ignorant of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I must state that I have never seen a disposition on my friend's part to change in the Senate on any subject whatever; and I think he is getting to that age now that he would not be likely to change; but I sometimes do change my opinions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is pretty clear. Mr. LOGAN. Yes, that is pretty clear. [Laughter.] I have changed my opinions frequently; but I can say, without being offensive in any way whatever to my friend from Connecticut, my friend from Michigan, and my friend from Vermont, that I have never known either one of them to change his opinions. They are very intelligent men. I do not say this as applicable to myself, for I know I am not a wise man; but there is an old saying, "Wise men do change, but a wise man; but there is an old saying, wise men to change, fools never do." [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That puts you on the right side.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether it does or not. I am only repeating an old saying. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps the Senator would change his opinion again and be wiser still?

Mr. EATON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WINDOM in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?
Mr. LOGAN. One at a time. I will yield as soon as I answer my friend from Vermont.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask if the last rule the Senator announces is universal, that fools never change?

Mr. LOGAN. There are always exceptions to rules. The exceptions prove the rule always.

Without dealing in this mode of discussing the question, I now ask without dealing in this mode of discussing the question, I now ask my republican friends, and especially our lecturer from Nebraska, to reflect for a moment on the political character of the question, inasmuch as he said or intimated, at least, that all there was of it was its political aspect. Suppose you put it on the ground that that is all there is in it. I say that is not all that is in it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state to the Senator from Illinois that I did not mean to make any such statement as that, nor do I think that my remarks will allow of any such construction or justify any such implication.

Mr. LOGAN. I perhaps did not exactly understand the full scope of the remarks of the Senator, but they left the impression on my mind that he thought the Republican party would gain nothing by this act. What did he mean by that, if he did not mean it in a political sense, thereby desiring us to infer that we must do that act by which we would gain something? Is not that the logic of it? It seems so to me. Let us see whether or not it is clear that we should take that into consideration. What do we see before us to-day? Louisiana is refused representation. Impeachments are inaugurated in these is refused representation. Impeachments are inaugurated in these Southern States for the purpose of getting rid of governors who have committed no crime perhaps. Such a course is being pursued as has never before been pursued in this country, in order to get rid of men who have republican sentiments and proclivities, that those of contrary views may be endowed with the official robes. If I believe republicanism is necessary and essential to the stability of this Government, all other things being equal, I am for my friends. If I can find the law as clear on the side of Mr. Pinchback as I can upon the side of a gentleman who believes in the destruction of this Government. of a gentleman who believes in the destruction of this Government, of a gentleman who believes in the destruction of this Government, if I can find as many reasons to vote for a republican to have a seat in the Senate as I can find against him, I will give the doubt on the side of the man who believes in the theory of government that I believe in. I believe the theory of republicanism is the very superstructure of this Government as well as the base upon which it must stand; and if we take the base and the props from under, the Government must go to pieces. I believe the democratic theory of this Government would destroy it; that it is the destructive element in it so far as theory is concerned. The political element of the democratic party has been shown to be of a destructive character, so far as the Government's consistency and integrity are concerned. Believing that, then I shall not hunt for reasons and doubts on the other side when then I shall not hunt for reasons and doubts on the other side when I believe the law has been complied with on my side.

"O," Senators will say, as my friend from Vermont said, "you thought there was no government there once." That is a very nice argument. That report was made prior to any recognition of this government whatever. Its recognition has come since, recognition by the House, recognition by the Senate, recognition by all the Departments of the Government of the United States, by all the departments of the State within itself, so as to give it that integrity as a government that a government can have under the existing laws. Hence I believe that, whether or not we had an opinion as to the integrity of the government at the time the report was made, the decisions and the recognition of all parts of the government are sufficient to give a prima facie case to the certificate of the governor of that State. My friend from Nebraska shakes his head. I do not blame him for that. Of course I cannot convince him. I do not expect to do so.

I have said all that I have desired to say in this case, and a great deal more than I expected to say when I rose, and I conclude by say-ing let the case be settled; and if our republican friends desire to settle it, with all the precedents in favor of Pinchback, so as to give us a good old sound democrat from New Orleans who does not believe in republicanism at all, let them settle it that way and take the responsibility. They have a perfect right to do it, but the responsibility be with them; and if the Senate is to be changed by such proceedings from its present character by our own friends, they them-selves to their own consciences and to their God and country are re-sponsible, and to no one else. I presume they can do it with a clear conscience, or at least they think they can.

Mr. HARVEY. My friend, the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. Pad-DOCK,] in the beginning of his speech said that if it was a question between Mr. Eustis and Mr. Pinchback he would vote for Mr. Pinch-back as the choice of evils. I presume that remark shows nothing personally, to the detriment of Mr. Eustis or of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. PADDOCK. I did not allude to either of the claimants personally, but to their cases.

Mr. HARVEY. That is just what I was coming to. The Senator mentioned their names, and said if it was between the two he would vote for Mr. Pinchback as the choice of evils. I take the ground if Mr. Pinchback is not elected, if there is a vacancy in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, if Mr. Eustis is not entitled to a seat here, some one else elected by the Legislature of Louisiana is entitled to

Mr. PADDOCK. When elected by a competent Legislature, he is most undoubtedly entitled, but not before. The constitutional requirements must be complied with before we can recognize a claimant for

Mr. HARVEY. I will vote for Mr. Pinchback's admission for that very reason, because he has been elected by a competent Legislature, because his election has been certified here by the governor of the State just the same as my election was certified, and that of the Senator from Nebraska; but I vote for him not as the choice of evils at all, but in recognition of law and in recognition of the precedents that govern this body. It is not for us to choose Senators. By the way, this reminds me of some remarks made by my friend the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who said that he would admit that the colored people were entitled to representatives here by reason of their numbers, and that he hoped to see the time when they would be represented here by Senators of whose ability and eloquence we might be proud. It does not devolve upon us to choose who the col-ored people or any other people in the United States having a majority in any State may see fit to send here. The question as to their ability or eloquence is not for us to determine. It is simply for us to determine whether they have been elected in accordance with law and to admit them in accordance with the precedents that have governed the admission of Senators to this body.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me to say merely this: that-whenever a colored Senator shall be elected I shall vote very readily to receive him; but what I object to is in the absence of such election by the Legislature of any State that the Senate itself should undertake to elect him.

Mr. HARVEY. I have merely quoted what the Senator said. My friend, the Senator from Nebraska, also commented upon the way in which the people of the country would look upon the exercise of which the people of the country would look upon the exercise of power. It has been the history of this country, so far as I have been able to discover it, that the people look with more leniency upon a mistake if it should be made in the exercise of power with which a person has been invested than they do upon a failure to exercise in defense of right the power with which those in official position have been legitimately clothed. The history of the administration of James Buchanan, when he failed to exercise the power with which the Constitution and laws charged him, for the suppression of rebellion, is a notable instance of the truth of this proposition. I will say, too, that it is my opinion that the greatest troubles that have come upon the republican party and upon the country have risen from the fact that there has been an element in the party constantly insisting upon such non-partisan action that men should be taken up and intrusted with high places who had never been identified with the party; that is, high places who had never been identified with the party; that is, because of a disposition to go beyond and outside of those whose history has been such as to show that they were identified with the principles of the party.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to say that in my opinion the crowning glory of the republican party is that it admits of a diversity of opinor in respect to such questions.

Mr. HARVEY. I must say that it is a singular thing that a party can claim credit for diversity of opinion upon questions of right. As to questions of policy diversity is admissible.

Mr. PADDOCK. Who is to determine right?

Mr. HARVEY. Right in this country is determined by law and precedent; and it has been shown here repeatedly that the right of this claimant to a seat on a prima facie case is just as clear as the right of any other Senator sitting here. Not only the facts as they appeared upon the record at the time his credentials were sent up but the facts that have transpired since, have gone to confirm his right to

The Senator from Nebraska said that the republican party must rest its hope for success in this country upon the approval of the people of the great North. My friends, republican Senators, in my opinion if the republican party remains in power it must be for the reason that its action is in accordance with justice and in accordance with that its action is in accordance with justice and in accordance with the principles of the party.

In this country and at this time we are engaged in the endeavor to realize the most sublime political conception, i. e., nothing less than equal and full citizenship for all, without regard to race, color, or previous political condition or history, covering with that grand panoply the immigrant from every land, the emancipated sons of the soil, and those who forfeited political rights by leading insurrection against the Government and in support of a hostile organization. I do not mention this to rail against the defunct confederacy or those who fought in its armies, as the few and feeble blows that I had the power or opportunity to give were dealt during the armed conflict.

I only allude to the fact that these people, all of the classes named, have been given full citizenship in a proper and constitutional way to show the liberality of the American people and to show that we live in times of more than ordinary import, and that it is our duty to rise to the level of the occasion; for every true man can exercise the rights of a citizen with a higher and holier feeling of pride when he knows that none are unjustly deprived of the rights that he enjoys, and that he seeks no unmanly advantage over the unfortunate, whether the misfortune comes from adherence to political heresy or from being on what our democratic friends regard as on the wrong side of the "color line." I am for full amnesty for all who ask for it and full citizenship for all who deserve it. Equality before the law must be vindicated for every one everywhere in this country. If need be, the whole power of the United States should be launched against those who would by violence curtail the just rights of any American citizen, whether those rights be inherited or acquired by naturalization and threatened by the action of foreign powers, or whether they be gained by or through the constitutional amendments and assailed by those who owe allegiance to that Constitution, if not gratitude, for exemption from punishment for former offenses against it.

The political vantage-ground now held by every American citizen has not been cheaply and easily attained; it has cost a hundred years of political and military strife; hundreds of thousands of valuable lives and billions of treasure were lost in the struggle; and men and parties must appear before the awful tribunal of history for a verdict as to the part taken by each. Republican Senators, we are before that tribunal now. Our glorious party, sustained by the good people of the United States, made it possible for any one of any race who could secure an election by his State to take his seat in this high forum. Mr. Pinchback has secured that election; he has credentials in the same form that we brought here; they are signed by the man who is now acknowledged on all hands to be the governor of Louisiana. If he had been permitted to take the seat to which he is entitled, the enemies of equal rights would never have dared to perpetrate all the outrages of which they have been guilty; but delay has led them to say the republican party is not in earnest, does not mean to stand by its principles, therefore they may be outraged with safety; and I do not hesitate to say now that I believe that a failure to seat this man now would be regarded as a final and conclusive concession this man now would be regarded as a nual and conclusive concession to the white-line idea and an admission that a party is wanted to enforce that idea. John Bright says that "a political party somehow or other gathers itself up when it is wanted and by the time that it is wanted."

The white-line democratic party stands ready to execute that purpose whenever the ramphican party by further political diletante-

pose whenever the republican party, by further political diletante-ism, invites it to proceed. To be sure the white-line democracy, notwithstanding the gains made in some of the States by a canvass on withstanding the gains made it some of the States by a canvass on horseback with double-barreled shot-guns, is yet in a minority in the country, but vacillation here will so encourage an element in that party ever favorable to the settlement of political differences by brute force rather than by the peaceful attrition of parties and opinions, that we would be in serious danger of returning to the ancient style of parliament once in vogue in Poland or Hungary, where great masses of armed horsemen met to settle mooted questions rather than by legislative action by representative bodies, the momentum of masses being the criterion rather than the prevalence of opinion. If every violent aggression is followed by a concession of power, the re-sult is soon a revolution or anarchy. Thiers, the statesman of France, is credited with having said, "The opinions that have been raised to power have the right of defending themselves in the elections." might and should have gone further, and said that it was a duty as well as a right; and I have no hesitation in stating my belief that opinions that do not defend themselves here and now will not long remain in power. The opinions favorable to confining political power to favored races and classes are active and aggressive. Democrats here, if not disposed to apologize for or defend the violent aggressions upon the rights of republicans in the South, seem ever ready to seize upon their incidental results for party advantage. However loud the professions made in favor of viewing these matters only in a judicial light, we find that they vote always together in the way most conducive to the success of reactionary ideas and restrictive privileges. I regret to make this statement, for I feel a warm personal friendship for very many representatives of that party, and for many qualities of their heads and hearts a sincere admiration; but I many qualities of their heads and hearts a sincere admiration; but I believe fully what I have stated concerning their party policy, and can only reconcile it with their personal qualities by remembering that a well-known writer has stated that the "human soul is hospitable, and will entertain conflicting sentiments and contradictory opinions with great impartiality." For the course of a few of our own party friends it is harder still to account, for though few they are wise men; but this may be explained when we remember that Crit-tenden said, "It is easier to be just than to be wise." Those of us who are content to take the easier course of simple justice remember also that even the wise cannot long rule without justice; without justice there is no political salvation, even though you were born on Plymouth Rock, and nurtured far beyond the reach of the contamination of carpet-bagger, scalawag, or negro. There have ever been those who were ready to say "Stand aside, I am holier than thou;" but though the salt of the earth, they have never regenerated it.

He who spoke as never man spake consorted upon occasion with publicans and sinners; but his object was to do good, not to show how good he was. A relentless scrutiny of the character of the claimant, made by political and personal enemies, has so far shown nothing to his detriment but the fact that some years ago he was sent to prison by a provost-marshal on a charge of assault and battery. What I have heard of him from his friends and enemies leads me to believe him a fair representative of a large majority of the people of Louisiana, and fully believing that his right to a seat here is well established, I shall vote for his admission, reserving the right, should it be proved hereafter that he is not entitled to his seat, to vote for his expulsion just as promptly as I would vote for the expulsion for the same reason of the proudest Caucasian here, and not a whit more so. Inasmuch as Senators taking an opposite view of this case have freely stated how the votes cast one way or the other would appear to them, I will state how they will appear to me from my stand-point, which I believe to be substantially that occupied by the average American citizen who believes in equality before the law.

From this stand-point those who vote for admission seem to be voting in vindication of the rights of man, which should be the first consider-ation; and in vindication of the Constitution of the United States, which should be next; and in vindication of the rights of the State, a consideration of great importance indeed, so much so, that I think if my democratic friends agreed with me as to conclusions they would make this the first consideration. Our votes vindicate the rights of the State in all departments of her government, for the judiciary recognized the legality of the Legislature that elected Pinchback, and the executive certifies his election. All these are vindicated by our votes; while the adverse votes seem only to secure the perpetrators of outrages like those of the Mechanics' Institute, Colfax Parish, and Coushatta the political advantages sought for by them and accepted as incidental benefits by their party friends here and elsewhere way, but leave fifth to reconcile his vote to his consistence, and constitution, and his constituency, he being responsible to no one else.

Mr. MORTON. I simply want to say a word, not with the expectation of effecting anything by it. My friend from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is not present. I understood him to say in the course of his remarks that between Pinchback and Eustis he would vote for Pinchback as the choice between evils. Idid not know that the question turned upon such considerations. I supposed it was a question of law. If Pinchback has brought the evidence here upon which the Senate usually acts, he is entitled to his seat. If he has not brought that evidence, he is not entitled to his seat. But when my friend from Nebraska says that between Pinchback and Eustis he would vote for Pinchback, he admits away all questions of law, all questions of principle, involved in the case

There are political considerations which are not unworthy of our attention. I would say to my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that in my opinion the hesitation which the Senate has shown for three years in regard to the government in Louisiana, casting doubt upon it, has been productive of bloodshed and violence in that State. The white-leaguers have been induced and encouraged to attempt to overturn that government by murder and violence, because of the doubt and hesitation in the Senate of the United States in the recognition of that government. My opinion is to-day, and I invite the attention of my friend to it as a consideration worthy even of his attention, that if the Senate shall reject Pinchback upon the ground that he was not elected by the Legislature of Louisiana, it presents another incentive, another inducement, to renew those scenes of vio-lence and murder that have dishonored the land, and those will be responsible for it who bring it about by holding out this encouragement. It is saying to those men that there is no government down there that they are bound to respect or to which they are bound to yield obedience

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me a single word? Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say that there is not a man more responsible for my action upon the present occasion than the Senator from Indiana himself. I read from his report in relation to this whole question, which he fully investigated. I will read two or three sentences of his report. It will take but a moment. The Senator from Indiana says:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim.

Then he goes on further to say:

In the Antoine case Judge Durell not only assumed to determine who constituted the legal returning board but to prescribe who should be permitted to take part in the organization of the Legislature, and to enjoin all persons from taking part in such organization who were not returned by the Lynch board as elected; and this assumption of jurisdiction was made in the face of the express provision in the act of 1870 that its benefits should not extend to candidates for electors, for Congress, or for the State Legislature.

And he goes on further in relation to the same subject; and then he says:

Without concurring in the opinion that the election was void, I entertain no doubt that it was an organized fraud of the largest dimensions, and that a decided majority of the people of Louisiana sympathize with the Kellogg government and earnestly desire to see it maintained.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; and I stand by that now. That is just what I have said all the time, that the election was an organized fraud to carry the State democratic over a known republican majority of 16,000; and I call my friend's attention to the fact that he now proposes by the rejection of Pinchback to consummate that fraud and make it effective. That will be the effect of his vote. I did say that Judge Durell exceeded his jurisdiction; but I said right on following, that that did not vitiate the election of the members of the Legislature, that that did not vitiate the election of Mr. Kellogg. I have never defended Judge Durell, and I do not now. And my friend cannot shelter himself in his position, if he needs it, behind anything that I have said. I have said from the first, and I now repeat it in these closing moments, that Louisiana was a republican State by from 16,000 to 20,000 majority, but a conspiracy was formed to carry it democratic. Did that conspiracy succeed? I say it did not. My friend from Vermont says by his vote it did, and there is where we separate. Disguise it as you may, Senators, those of you who reject Mr. Pinchback do it upon the ground that a majority of 16,000 was stricken down by a conspiracy, and you seal that result by your votes. I do not believe it was stricken down. I believe the republicans carried that State. My friend from Nebraska said that as between Pinchback and Eastis he would vote for Pinchback as the choice of evils. He puts it entirely upon the wrong ground. My friend admits away all questions of law when he says that. I put Mr. Pinchback's claim on the ground that he has brought all the evidence here that the Senate ever requires to prove that he is entitled to a seat. He brought the same evidence that my friend brought from Nebraska, none the less; and if he puts it on the ground of a choice of evils, I tell him that choice is right here, because if Mr. Pinchback is rejected, Mr. Eustis will come in.

Mr. PADDOCK. In referring to the case of Mr. Eustis I only intended to mention it incidentally. I simply remarked, that as I understood the case of Eustis, in the event of a choice being absolutely required between these men, I should vote for Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. MORTON. I understood it precisely in that way. If Mr.

Pinchback was not elected, there was a vacancy when the last Legislature of Louisiana met about three months ago; and that Legislature had a right to fill it, unless my friend is driven to this extremity, that to justify himself in excluding Mr. Pinchback, he is bound to say that the present Legislature is illegal; and then he will be bound to say that the next one is illegal to keep them from electing a democrat at the next session; and therefore Louisiana is to be permanently dis-franchised. For my part I do not intend to stultify myself in that

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire simply to state that, as I understand, there was not a legal joint convention at the time that Mr. Enstis claimed to be elected.

Mr. MORTON. It is not necessary for me to give any opinion upon that question now. If the Legislature did not comply with all the terms, they have a right to elect a democrat when they come together; and if you strike out the name of Eustis and insert that of Marr or some other man, it comes to the same thing; it is a choice after all between Pinchback and a democrat, and a confederate democrat, too, at that. My friend says, as a choice between evils, he would take Pinchback. I tell him the choice between evils is here to-day; and if Pinchback is rejected, Eustis or some other man of the same proclivities, and perhaps history, will come here, and he will

Mr. President, there is one radical difference between the republi-Mr. President, there is one radical difference between the republican party and the democratic party. If the democratic party have doubts in regard to any matter, they cast them in favor of the democratic party. If my republican friends have doubts, they cast them always in favor of the democratic party; so that the democratic party, like the defendant in a criminal case, gets the benefit of all doubts; and my friend from New York [Mr. Conkling] suggests it is entitled to them for the same reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I want to inquire whether the Senator from Indiana is ever troubled with any doubts?

Mr. MORTON. I have very often doubts. I have a great many doubts in regard to the democratic party under any and all circumstances. I have, indeed. But, Mr. President, where the case was even as my friend from Illinois said, other circumstances being equal, I believe I should follow the democratic example and cast the doubts in favor of my own party; in favor of sound principles; in favor of sound government; in favor of the preservation of this Republic. But some of our republican friends take the other view of it: if they have doubts they have got to give the democratic party the benefit of them, and they stand up so perfectly straight that they lean a little over backward.

Mr. President, something was said about the colored people. My friend from Illinois struck the nail on the head precisely when he said that if this man Pinchback was a white man he would have been in his seat long ago. There is no sort of question about that. My friend his seat long ago. There is no sort of question about that. My friend from Connecticut answered by appealing to the case of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE.] There was not even a technical objection to Mr. BRUCE's admission, nothing that a democratic Senator could even hang up his hat on, not the smallest peg. If there had been any sort of objection to Mr. BRUCE's admission, any objection, although purely technical, I am afraid he would have had considerable difficulty in getting in here.

Now, Mr. President, let me say that there are nearly one million of voters in this nation watching the result of the vote you are about to take here with the deepest possible interest. The colored men of this country understand this question better than you think they do. They understand that in 1873, when this investigation was ordered, the Kellogg government was in full force and operation. They understand that that committee reported a bill to set that government aside and to order a new election, and they know that this Senate voted that bill down, thereby recognizing that government and permitting it to stand, and they know full well, too, that, whatever doubts may have been raised in regard to the validity of Kellogg's election at that time, every one of them has been settled in his favor. They know that a democratic House of Representatives has been constrained to acknowledge that he was the governor of Louisiana de jure and have seated six members of the other House upon his certificate alone. They know that this Senate has recognized him as governor in the broadest and most unequivocal manner. They know that the President has done so and has recognized the Legislature time and time again. They know that the supreme court of Louisiana, the last arbiter in regard to all questions arising under the constitution and laws of Louisiana, have time and time again recognized that takes of Louisiana, have time and time again recognized that every department of the State government of the State of Louisiana has thus been recognized, that hundreds of laws have been passed which are now in full force, that that Legislature proposed amendments to the constitution which have been adopted by the people. They understand that practically that Legislature and that government have been recognized for every purpose except the single election of Pinchback. When they understand all this, and then find Pinchback rejected, they will come to the conclusion that there

They can sit back here, for their battle has been fought for them bravely. They are a unit. They are a guard in reserve. They vote solidly and without question; they are troubled by no doubts and by no scruples. My friend from Delaware inquired whether I ever had doubts. I might turn back and ask him the question whether my democratic friends have doubts as to any question between a republican and a democratic candidate for the Senate?

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. This is a political question as well as a legal question, and the settlement of this question against Pinchback, I undertake to say, will have political conseagainst Pinchback, I undertake to say, will have political consequences far-reaching.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has at last apparently abandoned the field of the Constitution and of the law, and has gone into the region of political considerations, one in which everybody in this country knows he is pre-eminent; and the political considerations are that the people of this country are to believe, if I correctly understand him, that this man is to be voted against by those who do vote against him because he belongs to the colored race. I dislike very work to alluda to political considerations but in self-dadislike very much to allude to political considerations, but in self-defense I think I must for a single moment. I do not allude to them for anybody else except for myself and my colleague. Are we actuated by political considerations on account of the color of this man? Why, Mr. President, when the honorable Senator from Indiana himself was the chief among the men of Indiana, and when its laws condemned men on account of their color and put them outside of it-I do not say that he was a party to those laws, but I speak in a large way of public sentiment and political considerations—the little State which my colleague and myself have the honor to represent, uniting both democrats and whigs long before 1840, in its Legislatures, year after year, was passing resolutions and sending memorials to the Congress of the United States, sitting not in these Halls but in the halls they convided mystering against always as a given and grainful they then occupied, protesting against slavery as a crime and against discriminations of men on account of their race and their color. I must beg leave to say to my honorable friend for one that I do not believe myself that the small body of people whom we represent will be largely disturbed by the fear of the honorable Senator from Indiana that we are voting against this man on account of his race! I have said nothing about his race or his color. I confess that I would not vote to admit him a single moment sooner because he is colored. Neither would I vote not to admit him a single moment sooner because he is colored. Everybody of the people in the State I have the honor in part to represent, without respect of party, has always protested against discriminations of that character; and now we are to be brought up to public condemnation on the ground that we do not admit a man because he happens to be one color rather than another.

Mr. President, to borrow a phrase which has become common and very expressive here, "that won't do." I do not believe that the Senfrom Indiana will persuade any republican, I am quite satisfied that he will not persuade me, to vote for this man, believing that he has not been elected, because he happens to be of a different color from that of the large part of my people. I do not believe he will terrify any persons except those who have made up their minds to be terrified in advance by talk of that character. And I do not believe that anybody is going to be affected—I certainly hope not—by that other consideration to which the Senator has seemed to allude: that the consequence of declaring that this man has not been elected may be that at some time or other in the future a person of different political

Is the Senator himself prepared to decide upon credentials on grounds of that kind? "I pause for a reply," as the expression is. He certainly is not. He would scorn it as soon as any man. We all know that he would. This man is not elected a Senator because he is a republican. If he is elected Senator at all he is elected because he has received a majority of the votes of a lawful legislature. cause he has received a majority of the votes of a lawful legislature, and he would have been elected just as much had he been a democrat in case he had received the same vote of the same legislature. Can there be any question about it? Where then is the place, in honesty, in law, or in public policy, that these political considerations are to come in? To what point in this argument are they devoted? Nobody states to us, nobody can state to us; but they are swung about our heads here like a cloud that is to terrify us into believing what we do not believe, and like a cloud I think they will go way.

I do not want to spend your time, sir; this case has been so long pressed, and so much pressed by my friend from Indiana who gave us notice day before yesterday that he wished us to sit here until it should be done, and I hope we shall now. I do not desire to delay his wishes a single moment on this subject, to have this matter determined here and now, except to say one or two words in respect to what is called the Spencer case and the Robbins case. They are said to be precedents, and that we are overriding those upon which Senators now rely in deciding against this claim.

It is not now really pretended by any body, as it has not been so far as I know before, that any one of the matters reported by the Senafor from Indiana and the Senator from Illinois was incorrectly reported. O, no, it is not pretended that any one of the conclusions to which that committee came, derived from those facts, as distinguished from their proposition to pass a bill, is incorrect. Nobody has said that. But we have fallen under two precedents which require us to swear this man in and try the question as to whether he has a Legislature behind him afterward.

Now what was the Robbins case? A Legislature existing under the Now what was the Robbins case? A Legislature existing under the charter government of Rhode Island, legally elected, without any question by anybody, constituting the rightful Legislature of that State, and without any prohibition in the charter of Rhode Island against its continuing itself beyond the period for which it had been elected, undertook to do it. I do not say that it had the legal right to do it; I do not say that it had not; but it did undertake to do it, and no citizen of Rhode Island protested against it. It was the same peaceful, orderly government elected by the people that it was before; but it held over, exercising powers longer, as it was claimed, than it ought to have done. If there was or could be at that time any government in that State, it was the government constituted by that Legislature. ernment in that State, it was the government constituted by that Legislature and by its governor. In that state of things the time came when, according to the Constitution of the United States, it was neceswhen, according to the Constitution of the Chited States, it was necessary for that people to elect a Senator. That Legislature did it, and this body held that it was rightfully done, and being done it bound the people, and the succeeding Legislature elected by the people could not undo it. What parallel is there between that case and this? Nobody has undertaken to try to point out a parallel, and I venture to say there is not any; there is not one point, so far as I can understand it, in the two cases that is alike. I need not stop to point out the differences; they are absolutely patent. In one case you have undisputed a state of revolution and turbulence, contending factions by force and by fraud, with the sad intervention of the armies of the United States in the midst of it. In the other case you have a peaceful and orderly progress of a body elected confessedly according to law and all the people, holding, as it is claimed but not proved, longer than under whatever constitution—if you call it that—they had would allow. My honorable friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] says it was the best constitution in the world. I do not ANTHONY I says it was the best constitution in the world. I do not know but that it was. If it was I am not quite sure that that proves that Pinchback was elected. I do not see that it does really.

The Spencer case, as it is called, is the other precedent. I unhappily was not able to be present in the Senate when Mr. Spencer was sworn in. I do not know precisely what took place, but I know, in a general way, what the state of the case was, and it was this: The body of men who elected Mr. Spencer were, with two or three exceptions—I do not remember the exact number—confessedly, legally, regularly-elected members of that Legislature; they had the proper certificates in their hands; and, being prevented by force or intimida-tion from occupying the particular building in which the Legislatures had assembled, they occupied another in the same town, which often happens from motives of convenience when the capitol has been burned down, as has happened in my State; the Legislature has met in a church near by. I never heard any lawyer or anybody else say that that made the slightest difference with the regularity of the body. Here, then, in the case of Mr. Spencer, and I am quite sure I am right, for I think I was spoken to on the subject in the time of it—

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me?
Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

The Senator is mistaken as to the precise point in Mr. MORTON. the matter. In Alabama there were two Legislatures, one of which elected Mr. Spencer and the other Mr. Sykes. When Mr. Spencer brought his credentials here objection was made to his taking his seat on the ground that he was not elected by the Legislature of Alabama. The Senate decided, after two or three days' discussion, that, inasmuch as he held the credentials of the governor of the State, he was entitled to take his seat, and the question as to whether he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama was to be decided afterward, whether it was the court-house or the capitol legislature. Just so in the Potter and Robbins case from Rhode Island. The question was made in advance that Robbins was not elected by the true Legislature, but the Senate determined they would seat him first and try that question afterward.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah! Mr. President, were there two Legislatures in Alabama? I must be excused if I differ with the Senator. There was only one Legislature in Alabama if there was any at all.

Mr. MORTON. There were two bodies of men, each claiming to be the Legislature, and which one was the Legislature was not determined until afterward. That is the point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the Senator's point, but it does not happen to be borne out by the law or the facts. I do not know that that makes any difference to him; but I think it does make considerable difference

Mr. MORTON. It is borne out precisely by the facts. Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not care if there were a hundr I do not care if there were a hundred bodies of men, or five hundred, that called themselves legislatures; I take it that did not make them so. There was only one Legislature in the State of Louisiana, and I undertook to show the other day that we were bound to know, and did know in every legal sense, which that Legislature was, what was the body in a State in respect of its being the constitutional Legislature of that State; and I gave reasons for that opinion; and although the honorable Senator from Indiana has addressed us two or three times since that, I have not had the honor to hear or to read in the reports of his remarks in the RECORD any contradiction of that proposition. The honorable Senator is too good a lawyer and too great a statesman to get into a dispute on that subject.

Now I find by the Journal of the Senate that instead of the Senate contradictions.

Now I find by the Journal of the Schate that income prima facie ate's declaring that Mr. Spencer was either Senator or prima facie Senator, they merely declared that he should be sworn. What right has the Senator from Indiana to say that they declared that he should be sworn upon one ground or another ground? He may have been sworn upon one ground or another ground? He may have been sworn upon one ground that was perfectly satisfactory to my friend; he may have been sworn upon another ground that was perfectly satisfactory to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. Morrill,] whom I take only for illustration. What does that prove? There being no declaration, as in this case, that this man is to be entitled for six years, it simply proves that for one reason or another commending itself to the judgment of a majority of this body it was right to swear him in simply and solely. Then we looked to what the case was. I repeat, and the Senator has not denied it and I do not want it put out of sight, that the body of men that elected Mr. Spencer were at that time unquestionably holding, with the exception of two or three, the certificates from the original sources according to the laws of Alabama.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me? We found out that fact

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator from Indiana may have found it out then; I do not know whether he would ever have found it out if he had not inquired; but he still does not come to the point of the public information that we knew just as well at first as we did afterward, and whether we actually knew it or not made no difference if it was true. The law may be ascertained in ten years after a litigation, but it has been the law all the time, and there it So it was a fact, a public fact well known to everybody, that stood. So it was a fact, a public fact well known to everybody, that the body of men that elected Mr. Spencer was the Legislature of Alabama, if there was any Legislature at all in that State, and it was conceded that there was, for it was a regular election, and there was a mere contest in three or four or five disputed cases. We all perfectly well knew as a public fact that that body of inen was and ought to be the Legislature, and that it was by the sheerest and most barefaced fraud and misconduct that credentials had been withheld from two, three, or four men who sat in that body. How is it in Louisiana? The body of men who elected Mr. Pinchback was composed constitutionally of about one hundred and five or one hundred and six members of the house of representatives, and I have forgotten how many senators, thirty or forty, or whatever the number may be; and there was not a quarter of them in either body. I am now using the word "quarter" in a general sense; I am not sure am now using the word "quarter" in a general sense; I am not sure about the exact proportion, but there was very much less than half (which is enough on the subject of a quorum) who had any pretense of being elected except that found in the report or certificate of the Lynch board. That is the difference.

So, then, the case of Alabama and the case of Louisiana are wide

So, then, the case of Alabama and the case of Louisiana are wide apart, let me tell the Senator from Indiana; and if he will pardon the illustration, I will say as wide apart as was the case of the two donkeys, who, according to the old fable, once had a confabulation. One donkey, being laden with bags of salt, marched through a deep brook and wet the salt. He found that his load as he went on grew lighter. He told his remarkable discovery to another donkey who was laden with wool, and he marched through a very deep brook, and he found that his load was a good deal heavier. Now, it may be salt for Alabama, but it is certainly wool for Louisiana. The loading is entirely under different circumstances and is to be followed by an entirely under different circumstances and is to be followed by an entirely different result, if we follow the Constitution and the law.

Then, Mr. President, in my judgment—and I say it with great deference—we are not violating any precedent in the Robbins case or any precedent in the Spencer case; we are acting in entire harmony with both those cases; we are acting in entire harmony with the report of the honorable Senator himself; for I wish to call it once port of the honorable Senator himself; for I wish to call it once again to the attention of the Senate, not by way of criticising or condemning anybody for changing his opinion, but by way of recalling the attention of the Senate to the facts in respect to which none of these gentlemen say they have changed their opinion. What is stated in that report, agreed to in that respect by everybody? That this Lynch board, in order to fight the devil with fire, in order to make up this legislature, resorted to what? It is sworn to by witnesses of our own party that they were determined to make a republican legislature, no matter what the returns were. That the report says on the testimony of Bovee, and it is the testimony of Bovee. Accordingly they forced affidavits by the thousands, by the bushel, and on those they forged affidavits by the thousands, by the bushel, and on those affidavits they issued these certificates. If that makes a legislature, it does not make a legislature for me. But I did not intend to take up as much time as I have.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word. My friend is usually clear upon questions of law; but I think he was not to-day. Just let me state the Alabama case again, and I do not think it can be concealed for a moment that in rejecting Pinchback you trample down the precedent set by this body in the Alabama case. In Alabama there were two legislatures in session at the same time, or two bodies, each claiming to be the Legislature. It was a very nice question. Mr. Spencer came here with a certificate signed by the governor. He was about to be sworn in. Objection was made, and a motion was made to refer his credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to examine the question which was the Legislature of Alabama. The Senate said, "As he has the certificate, we will not refer it; we will admit him." He was admitted; but that was not the form of the resolution; but we refused to refer the credentials, and then he was sworn in. After that the investigation was instituted, and at the end of five or six months the report was made that that body by which SPENCER was elected was the Legislature of Alabama. If my friend from Vermont says that he knew all the facts going to show that it was the Legislature of Alabama from the beginning, he knew a great deal more than I did or a great deal more than the body of the Senate did. It was after a long examination and the sifting of the testimony that we came to determine that he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama.

In the Potter and Robbins case the Legislature of Rhode Island had extended its own existence one year by a joint resolution, a very doubtful proceeding, a question of doubtful power; and, after doing that, elected Mr. Robbins to the Senate. He came here with his credentials. Objection was made. In the mean time there had been another election, and a Legislature, undoubtedly legal, had been chosen; and that Legislature had elected a Senator. The Senate said, inasmuch as Mr. Robbins comes with the certificate of the governor, we will seat him, and will examine the question afterward whether he was elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island.

It is impossible to distinguish those two cases in principle from the one before us; and to reject Pinchback upon this testimony is to trample down the rule established by the Senate. No sort of skillful, special pleading, no fine distinctions can evade that responsibility. To reject this man, we have to trample under foot the fundamental law of this body, recognized more than half a century ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, a single word only, because I am delaying the consummation of the wishes of my friend from Indiana too long in having this matter brought to a vote. I would like to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana; no, I will not ask him, because that would seem to imply that I shall compel him to make another speech. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senate to one point: I have nothing more to say about the Alabama case or the Robbins case; but—and to comes to my mind from what he has said—I inquire how it happens that when this same body of men sent here the credentials of John Ray, under the same signature of the governor, so called, under the same great seal of the State, elected by this same body of men—and I am not sure but on the same day that Mr. Pinchback was; certainly within a day or two—under the same course of procedure, the one for the short, the other for the long term, and when those credentials were presented at the same time that Mr. Spencer's credentials were presented, everybody unanimously agreed that the credentials from Louisiana should go to a committee, and the majority agreed that the credentials of Mr. Spencer should not? Was there not a difference in the judgment of the Senate between the two cases? Why did not the honorable Senator from Indiana get up two cases I Why did not the honorable Senator from Indiana get up and say "Here is a prima facie case; here is the great seal of the State of Louisiana; here is the governor of Louisiana de facto, at any rate, upheld by the courts," as he says in the very report to which he appended his name? Why did he not say it? Because in respect of the State of Louisiana everything was abnormal. It did not fall within the line of any precedent wherein we thought the public safety would surported up to take any step until we should have consafety would authorize us to take any step until we should have considered what the law and the public safety required.

Mr. President, it is perfectly incomprehensible to me that we are to make fish of one of these men and flesh of the other on what is called make usin of one of these men and ness of the other on what is called a prima facie case, or under the great seal of the State, or the signature of Governor Kellogg. But the honorable Senator says all this has been confirmed by somebody. I did not know that the House of Representatives could confirm anything for us on a question of this kind; and I have a vague impression that there is a very high principle of parliamentary law that does not even allow a Senator to allnde to the proceedings or the decision of another House with a view to influence the decision of this body. And yet the most powerful and urgent appeals which the Senator from Indiana has felt compelled to make to us in favor of this man have been based on the fact that somebody in the House of Representatives, or the whole body of the House of Representatives, has done something that he construes, erroneously in my opinion, to be in favor of his view, as a guide to us.

Mr. President, a case that must resort to that species of pressure must lack a good deal of essential ingredients. If there is any one thing which is to make this Government secure under the law and the Constitution, it is that every department of the Government, as was stated by the Supreme Court in a case to which I alluded the other day, should do its duty upon its own solemn responsibility, uninfluenced, except so far as the reasons given are influential, by the judgments or opinions of any other body.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word in regard to John Ray's case. The Senator says "John Ray was our man, was he not?" I should have supposed the Senator would hardly claim John Ray under the circumstances; but leaving that aside my friend I think der the circumstances; but leaving that aside, my friend, I think, must remember the history of that transaction. The committee reported in the first place that the election was void for fraud; they reported also a bill to set aside the Kellogg government and order a new election; they also reported back the credentials of Ray to lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator misses the point. My point sugested to him was, how it happened that we referred the credentials of Ray when presented, before the report, when we did not refer the credentials of SPENCER?

Mr. MORTON. We did it for this very reason: At the time Ray's credentials came here it was doubted whether Kellogg was governor of Louisiana; that was the very thing in dispute at that time

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The reason they were referred was this: Mr. Ray's credentials were signed by one governor and Mr. McMillen's were signed by another. Each was signed by a different man claiming to be governor. That was the reason the matter was referred, to determine that question.

Mr. MORTON. At the time Ray's credentials came here it was denied that Kellogg was governor, and the committee was examining that very question among others. The committee reported that the election was void, reported a bill ordering a new election and setting aside the Kellogg government, and also reported back Ray's credentials to lie on the table. The first thing the Senate did was to take up the bill ordering a new election and setting aside the Kellogg government. We debated that bill at great length. We decided that question just three days before the adjournment of Congress. The bill was voted down, and the Kellogg government was sustained by the Senate refusing to take action against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a sustaining of a government?

Mr. MORTON. Practically it was a sustaining of it, because it defeated the bill proposing to set it aside, and I take it that was sustaining it. At that period of the session there was no time left to take up the question of Ray or any other senatorial aspirant; we had barely time to get the appropriation bills through, as every Senator then a member of this body will remember.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had not intended to take part in this discussion, nor do I propose now to detain the patience of the Senate except for a few moments; but some remarks have been made in the course of this debate, particularly in the latter part of it, and some magisterial rebukes have been administered, that I do not like to sit down under, entirely in silence.

The report of the committee on Louisiana affairs in February, 1873, has been quoted here, and the names of the Senators appended to it have been repeated so often, that even mine may not have altogether escaped the attention of the Senate. To that report, with much reluctance, and under a sort of protest-it would not be proper to repeat what was said in the committee, but what I said in the Senate is recorded in the Globe—I assented. It was with great reluctance that I agreed to the proposition of the committee, that an election should be held in the State under the direction of the Federal Government. The report stated that there was no legal State government in Louisiana, and recommended a bill for an election under the direction and the protection of the Federal Government. It was a very grave responsibility, a very dangerous precedent, to apply the power of the Federal Government to a State election; but under all the difficulties that surrounded that case, with the obstacles which were interposed at every outlet from these difficulties, it seemed to me that the course proposed, although full of objection, was the least objectionable. The Senate refused to pass that bill; the Senate refused to say that there was no legal government in Louisiana. It followed then, it seemed to me, that there was a legal government in Louisiana. Two seemed to me, that there was a legal government in Louisiana. Two organizations professing to be such government existed. One of them was forced or attempted to be forced upon an unwilling and a resisting people by such fraud, corruption, and violence, by every moral offense and every legal crime, from lying to murder, as never before made a mockery of a popular election. The other organization, in my judgment, represented the will of the people of Louisiana; but the expression of that will in a legal form was, in a great degree, hindered by fraud and by violence; and the forms of law are a part of the law, and are, sometimes, almost as essential as the laws themselves, to the preservation of liberty and of good government.

Compelled then to choose between those two, I selected the one which I thought represented the popular will. Subsequent to that report, a decision of the supreme court of Louisiana practically affirmed the validity of that government. It has been argued here with a force that was hardly necessary for so evident a proposition, that we are not bound by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana. Of course we are not bound by it. We are the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of members of this body. We are not bound by the supreme court of Louisiana, nor by the Supreme Court of the United States, nor by any power whatever; but it is natural that we should pay respect to the judgment of such a tribunal. If it be an inconsistency to hold to one opinion in 1873, and in the light of further argument and of further reflection and of further facts, or rather further argument and of further reflection and of further facts, or rather of a further argument and of further reflection and of further facts, or rather of a further acquaintance with facts which had taken place before, to hold to a different opinion in 1876, I shall not detain the Senate with any defense of it. And if it is held by anybody that such a change, whether on good ground or not, may not be an honest and an intelligent one, I shall not weary anybody's attention with a defense. But it was not upon this point that I rose to speak. I do not propose to enter upon the argument which has already been exhausted.

I have been provoked to speak, at this late period of the debate, by the speeches of some of the Senators, which assume, as a matter of course, that we all believe that Mr. Pinchback was not legally elected, and that we were voting for him from political considerations. I do not feel called upon to plead to that indictment. If I did, I might find some defense in my record. In the time, now more than seventeen years, of my service here, I have been called upon to vote in many contested elections. When Mr. Stockton came here, with the broad seal of the State of New Jersey upon his commission, and with the authentication of his election by the Legislature of that State, it was a time when we all desired very much indeed to add a republican Senator to this body; much more so than anybody desires it now, on political considerations. The general judgment of the party with which I acted was against him. It was my opinion that he was legally elected, acted was against him. It was my opinion that he was legally elected, and with very few republican Senators I voted for him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And you turned out to be right.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought so then, and on that point I have not had occasion to change my mind. Some of the Senators against whom I voted very reluctantly were as good lawyers and as wise men as any who were then members of this body. When Mr. Thomas came here, with the broad seal of the ancient Commonwealth of Maryland, and when a majority of the republican Senators voted against his admission, on account of an act of alleged disloyalty it was my independent. and when a majority of the republican Senators voted against his admission, on account of an act of alleged disloyalty, it was my judgment, against that of the greater part of my friends, that the act was not a disloyal one, and I voted to give him his seat. And when the contest took place between Mr. Abbott, a republican, and Mr. Ransom, a democrat, claiming a seat in the Senate from North Carolina—in that case I acted with a large part, if not a large majority, of the republicans—I thought the seat belonged to Mr. Ransom, and I so voted. If, therefore, these instances may not pardon my offense now, I at least hope that, having voted to seat three democrats here, two of them against the judgment of nearly all my political friends, it may be some mitigation of the punishment due to me for voting to seat a republican, when I am so fortunate as to agree with the greater part of my political friends.

I do not charge the Senators on the other side with being influenced by their political prejudices. We are all liable unconsciously to be influenced somewhat by our political prejudices; but I do not believe that they vote against Mr. Pinchback on account of his race or color. I believe they vote against him because they think he is not or color. I believe they vote against him because they think he is not entitled to a seat, and I am sure that our friends on this side, who vote against him, must vote from the most conscientious motives, because their preference would be to seat him. But the same credit that I give to the motives of others I claim for my own, and for those with whom I vote. I do not think that Senators upon this side of the Chamber should charge us with being governed by any other than pure motives for the vote which we give. I claim from them the

My friend from Michigan, [Mr. Christiancy,] who yesterday administered a very severe rebuke to all of us, is learned in the law; he made an able and logical speech, to which I listened with attention; but I did not feel that I was entitled to the rebuke with which he closed that speech when he asked who of us would vote for Mr. Pinchback if he was a democrat; because, learned as my friend is, he does not hold all the law of the Senate; some drops from that overflowing cup have fallen upon the humbler heads of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] the Senator from New York, [Mr. Conkling,] the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. Wright,] the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] and others who agree with me. The wisest of us are liable to error, and upon one side or the other a large minority of the Senators must be in error upon this question; but I submit that, if the wrong be on our side, the offense is not such a manifest dereliction of duty as to call for imputations upon our motives.

Let our arguments be answered; they may be wrong. Let our facts be denied; they may not be sufficiently grounded. But we are entitled to a candid and honest consideration of our motives. And to those who look down upon us from such an elevation of law and morals, I venture to suggest that, if no respect for the judgment, if no consideration for the weaknesses of others can temper the severity that belongs to so great consciousness of superior wisdom, surely some quality of charity might descend to connect such lofty virtue with the frailties of our common humanity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to insert the word "not" before "admitted;" upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOGY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Alcorn.] If he were here he would vote against the amendment and I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] If he were here he would against the amendment and I should vote for it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr.

WADLEIGH.] If he were present he would vote in favor of the amendment and I should vote against it.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WRIGHT (when his name was called.) As I have stated on

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) As I have stated on two occasions, I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote 'nay" on this amendment.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 29; as follows:

mont. Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Sanisbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Dawes, Goldthwaite, Oglesby, Robertson, Wadleigh, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOGY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Alcorn.] If present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] as I have before stated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I have already stated that on this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.]

Mr. GORDON, (when Mr. CLAYTON'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Arkausas [Mr. CLAYTON] to state when his name was called that he was paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and the Senator from Alabama would vote "yea."

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) The pair to which I have referred with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] applies upon this question as upon the preceding one.

plies upon this question as upon the preceding one.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS-Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mcrrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Dawes, Goldthwaite, Oglesby, Robertson, Wadleigh, and Wright—12.

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be not admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning on the 4th of March, 1873.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON TRIALS FOR WHISKY FRAUDS.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the members of the se-lect committee ordered by the House for the investigation of matters connected with the so-called whisky suits and the Attorney-General's of Missouri; Mr. Cochrane, of Pennsylvania; Mr. McMahon, of Ohio; Mr. McCarry, of Iowa, and Mr. Plaisted, of Maine.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As chairman of the Committee on Elections of this House, every moment of time which I can spare for the publice service out of this Hall, in fact more time than I can give to it is recovered for that committee. to it, is required for that committee. If I go into this investigation I must neglect the one committee or the other. I dislike to be in a situation where I cannot discharge my whole duty. I therefore must ask the House to excuse me from service on the select committee just announced.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be excused, and the Chair will announce the appointment of some one to fill the vacancy during the day.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate requested the return of the follow-

A bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injuri-

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the request of the Senate will be complied with and the bill returned.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of privilege. I observe in the RECORD of this morning, of the debates and proceedings of yesterday on the privileged question which was presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] and by his associates, that there has been added to the report of the debates by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] whom I regret not to see in his seat, a note explanatory of the position taken by the gentleman from Mississippi is that debate. in that debate. I observed the other day that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] added to the report of the debate in which he took part a note giving a further and fuller extract from some document that he had previously cited.

Now, I do not claim for a moment that either of those gentlemen intended to commit any impropriety, or that anything in the addition which they made to their remarks in either case would be in the least which they made to their remarks in either case would be in the least unpleasant or disagreeable to the House or to any person who took part in the debate. But it is obvious that the correctness of this record of the debates, its absolute fidelity, is the protection and the only protection of all of us in our public lives here against misrepresentation elsewhere. One of two things must exist: we must be judged by the country from newspaper abstracts, sometimes misunderstanding, sometimes misrepresenting what we say, or we must have this an absolutely faithful record, to which for our vindication we can at all times appeal for what actually took place in the House, with its defects, its merits, its literal accuracy.

I have therefore taken an occasion when there is no personal ground for complaint of the gentlemen for what they have done, to arrest in its inception the practice of adding anything—I do not speak now of grammatical or slight corrections which do not change the substance the practice of adding, as a note or as a matter of substance, anything to the record of our debates, as a violation of the privileges of this House. And I am sure that the two gentlemen to whom I have referred will be among the first to recognize and to insist upon this which is so important to all of us.

Mr. COX. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I beg to say that sometimes these difficulties about the RECORD come from the reporters, though very rarely.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman perhaps did not understand the fact which I stated.

Mr. COX. I did.
Mr. HOAR. It was the addition of a distinct substantive note.
Mr. COX. I hold it a rule never to change the RECORD, whether the case is one of personal colloquy—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the House for a moment. The attention of the Chair has been lately called to the fact that the space in the immediate front of the reporters' desk is very often occupied by persons who have no right to be there, and the ability of the reporters to hear the debates and proceedings of the House is thereby very much impaired. The Chair hopes that gentlemen, members of the House, will avoid that sort of obstruction hereafter. And the Chair especially directs that the door-keepers shall see that other persons are not allowed to gather about the desks of the reporters.

Mr. COX. I desire to say that a great deal of undue odium is placed upon members with reference to this RECORD. Now the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] yesterday made, I think, a little mistake with reference to what he had said in the House when he declared that even if he were alone he would vote so and so. I have not been able to find that remark in the RECORD. I do not suppose that he revised or altered it.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; never.
Mr. COX. We all remember, however, that the other day the gentleman said that I had suppressed a very obnoxious word. I never saw the manuscript of the debate on that day and occasion; I never corrected my remarks, directly or indirectly. I suppose the reporters left out that remark from their own sense of propriety. For that they are entitled to my thanks. It is a rare thing to find our reporters at fault.

Now, what I wish to say to the gentleman is this: Many things occur in this House which are not placed in the Record—omitted by the reporters themselves. We must have some opportunity for revision. How far that should go ought to be regulated by some rule. If the gentleman will propose a rule and have it referred to the Committee on the Rules, I am sure that we will take it into consideration and make a report.

Mr. HOAR. The point to which the gentleman from New York addresses himself is not the point I am now making. I am not referring to the revision of the grammar of speeches, or even the striking out of something a gentleman may have uttered in haste, and which he does not desire to have stand in the permanent RECORD as something which is to go to the country. That question stands on its own merits, whatever they may be. I am speaking of two cases in which there has been added to the RECORD a substantive matter of argument; in the case of the gentleman from Georgia, the simple printing in full of a few sentences to which the gentleman had alluded. Now, it might have been quite agreeable to me to have added also to that debate by printing in full several other extracts from the proceedings of the convention to which the gentleman from Georgia alluded. I am sure the gentleman from Georgia would have been very glad to have had me do it. There was no intention on his part to change his attitude in the debate, and he did not, in fact, change that attitude. As I said when I first mentioned this matter, there was nothing improper done by either of these two gentlemen; but I thought it proper to take an occasion when there could be no possible suggestion of any impropriety having actually been intended, to call the attention of the House to the fact that, unless we plant ourselves on the principle that this RECORD shall be a literal and exact transcript of the substance of what we say here, we are all of us defenseless in regard to our public lives and our public history.

Mr. HILL. I appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and I desire further to say that I made no alteration whatever in my remarks on the occasion alluded to. I read a portion of one resolution, and having only five minutes did not complete the reading of that resolution, simply intending to call attention

Mr. HOAR. It is not a resolution; it is an extract from a long addres

Mr HILL. It is not exactly a resolution; it is an extract from the report. Well, after I was through the reporter sent for the book and wanted me to indicate the portion that I had quoted. I simply said (pointing out the language which subsequently appeared in the form of a note) that I thought it fair to print that much; that, though I did not read all that language, I referred or called attention to it. Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment? I said (and I presume the gentleman so understood me) that I selected an instance in which there could be no possible suggestion of any impropriety, in order to call the attention of the House to the matter, rather than take an occasion about which there might

to the matter, rather than take an occasion about which there might be some feeling.

Mr. HILL. I appreciate the remark; I am not complaining of anything the gentleman has said.

Mr. HOAR. The addition made by the gentleman from Mississippi, which the gentleman may not have seen, is the statement that he was not aware at a certain time of a certain statute. Of course the House would be entirely willing in this case that such an addition should be made; every member would consent to it. But it changes the attitude of the debate.

Mr. HILL. There was nothing in my case that changed the atti-

Mr. HILL. There was nothing in my case that changed the attitude of the debate at all. I would have read the whole passage, except for the fact that I had but five minutes; and I thought it fairest, even with regard to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I est, even with regard to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I should simply say to the reporter that that whole quotation should be put in; for I stopped in my reading in the very middle of a line, simply intending to call the attention of the gentleman to it. The reporter, upon his own motion, and doubtless wisely, put the passage in a foot-note without any instructions from me. I did not know that it was to be there until I saw it in print the next morning. I did not see the report until I saw it published in the RECORD. I did not revise the manuscript at all in that case.

As to the other case the gentleman mentions I have nothing to say

As to the other case the gentleman mentions, I have nothing to say. The gentleman from Mississippi is not in his seat. But still I cannot see anything in that which changes the debate.

Now, on the general subject I would say that I concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts. I think alterations in speeches ought o be confined to such changes of phraseology as would strengthen the meaning of what was spoken and put it correctly before the House as it was intended by the speaker and as it was understood by the House. I concur with him fully that no change ought to be made which would change the character of the debate in the slightest degree. My opinion is we ought not to change at all.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to state one fact to the House. About two years ago one of the most influential and able newspapers in this country stated it would furnish to the people for five cents a day as much of the debates of Congress as it was desirable to have them see. We have no defense against that proposition except the literal fidelity of this record of our debate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report from the Committhe on Appropriations the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. Prior to the presentation at the desk of that report I wish to say a word or two in explanation. This bill has involved a great deal of labor. I did not myself nor do I believe any of the members of the committee expected so intricate an investigation of the second second control of the committee expected so intricate an investigation of the committee expected so in t investigation and arduous labor as have been imposed upon them.

We have been able to make full comparison with the estimates for next year and the appropriations of the current fiscal year. The estimates as furnished for subjects embraced in this bill from the Departments amounted to $20,773,306.70. The appropriations for the purposes embraced in this bill for the current fiscal year were $18,734,422.20.

The appropriations which we recommend for the adoption of the House are $12,708,833,61... a radaction years the setimates of abort $3,000,000. are $12,799,833.61—a reduction upon the estimates of about $8,000,000 and upon the previous appropriation of about $6,000,000.

In addition to that we have laid the foundation of further reduction by appropriate legislation in this bill of more than $5,000,000. So that, Mr. Speaker, we feel in asking the adoption of this bill by the House that we recommend a reduction in the aggregate which will reach upon the appropriations for the current fiscal year a reduction of more than $11,000,000 in this one bill.

It is due in this connection that I should state that these reductions ome from the Committee on Appropriations with almost unanimity. At the suggestion of the Military Committee, we recommend the Indian Bureau shall be transferred to the War Department. That will effect, in my judgment, a direct reduction of appropriation of $1,000,000 in the Indian appropriation bill; and I have the authority of the Military Committee. of the Military Committee to state that in the judgment of Lieutenaut-General Sheridan a further reduction in that connection will be made in the Army bill of $3,500,000.

We recommend the abolition of fifty-three special agents in the customs, because we believe them utterly inefficient or unnecessary. We have granted permission, or I am instructed to allow in reference to the Pension Bureau the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to offer two amendments, one looking to the payment of pensions directly from the Department here, which will, in the judgment of the chairman of that committee, save half a million of dollars, and the other looking to the transfer of the Pension Bureau from the In-terior to the War Department, which, according to the judgment of the Committee on Pensions. will save in the aggregate a clerical force of three hundred persons.

One word more. We have reached this result, Mr. Speaker, with almost unanimity, after much industry and great labor, which is most commendable. I am authorized to say there is no difference in the committee, among any of its members, in relation to the propriety of these reforms and retrenchments with the exception of here and there a few propositions which the majority of the committee have ingrafted upon this bill, not to exceed in my judgment more than $200,000 of further expenditure. I may say therefore that in the aggregate the millions saved by this bill have the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

I herewith submit for the information of the House a summary recapitulation showing a comparison of appropriations made in 1875—76, and the estimates for 1876—77, with what we recommend to be

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to add that it is believed that the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department will in nowise affect the efficiency of the agencies heretofore used to civilize and ameliorate the condition of the Indians, but will leave in full force the peace commission, which has been heretofore resorted to as a mode of accomplishing that pur-

Mr. RANDALL. I would state in that connection that the appropriation for the peace commission is not embraced in this bill; but the judgment of the committee, as far as I am able to ascertain it, or at least of the majority of the committee, is that the peace commission be retained.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that double the usual number of copies be printed. I also give notice that I will move on the day after to-morrow to go into Committee of the Whole for general debate upon this bill. It is the design of the committee, if possible, to go into the consideration of the details of the bill on Monday, and to proceed with it as far as we are able to do so without interruption until completed. The proposition is to allow general debate during the balance of this week. Mr. FOSTER. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will permit me to make a short statement.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The chairman of the committee has not overstated the amount of labor that has been performed to accomplish the result that has been brought before the House this morning in its report of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It is true that the minority of that committee have labored with the zeal attested by the chairman of the committee for the reduction of expenditures as stated by him. In accordance with the policy adopted by the republican party for the past several years, we have favored a reduction of expenditures. When we went into the consideration of this bill of expenditures. When we went into the consideration of this bill I am free to say that I believed that the chairman of the committee and the majority of the committee were proposing too radical and too great reductions. But I want to say to the House that investigation of the matter has induced me to believe that, generally speaking, the reductions proposed by this bill can be safely concurred in by the

But, Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee I think has stated at too low a sum the additions that the minority of the committee will propose to the bill. He stated, if I understood him correctly, that perhaps the minority would propose an addition of $200,000 to the bill. The minority will propose additions in various places, in my judgment aggregating a million dollars, possibly a million and a half; and notably in the portion of the bill relating to the Internal Revenue Department. In this Department a sweeping radical reduction has been made, such as in my judgment will endanger the collection of the revenues. It is not my purpose at this time, Mr. Speaker, to go into the details of this bill, but merely to set the minority of the committee right. We have favored all the possible reductions in committee, and we propose to favor them on the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. It is proper that I should say that in reference to the appropriations for the Internal Revenue Bureau we have had unlimited intercence with that Bureau I did under that that the limited intercourse with that Bureau. I did understand that the amount which would be suggested as an increase for that Bureau was about $200,000; and I want to say now that when this bill shall come to be discussed I shall be able to show and to establish the fact that these reductions as to that Department are based upon their own

The bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and double the usual number of copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire that on the day after to-morrow the House shall go into Committee of the Whole on the bill for general debate, so that general debate will continue during the present week; and on Monday I shall move to cut off general debate and go into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill by sections for amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the House to make that entire order at this time?

Mr. RANDALL. I do. Mr. KELLEY. If that order be made and the Hawaiian bill is not got out of the way in the mean time, it would be displaced.

Mr. RANDALL. I should think that to-day and to-morrow would be sufficient for the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I think so myself.
Mr. RANDALL. But I should feel it necessary to antagonize this bill to anything else.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection to that. It makes it the more imperative to dispose of the Hawaiian bill.

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the House to do that. Is it the pleasure of the House that the bill just reported from the Committee on Appropriations shall be assigned for consideration in Committee of the Whole on the day after to-morrow and during the remainder of this week, and that on Monday next, after the morning hour, it be considered by paragraphs for amendment?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Is it necessary to reserve points of order at this time? I desire to make the usual reservation.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to that.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to recognize the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Purman] for a personal explanation; but if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knott] rises to present a privileged report he is entitled to the preference.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PURMAN. I rise to a question of privilege concerning an imputation upon my honor as a member of this body, and I send to the Clerk's desk this newspaper, and ask him to read the extract indicated therein.

The Clerk read as follows:

ANOTHER MONEY-MAKING CONGRESSMAN.

Under this head the New York Sun prints the following telegram from this city: "WILLIAM J. PURMAN, a republican Congressman from Florida, so several witnesses have testified before the Naval Committee, has been increasing his worldly possessions by the sale of a naval cadetship, and also some of the Federal offices in Florida; also, that he has received bribes for appointments, and has made his congressional position pay very well. Governor Stearns, of Florida, and Martin, the keeper of the State penitentiary, were the witnesses."

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Speaker, after the broad promulgation of such charges as are contained in the extract just read by the Clerk, it becomes my solemn duty, both to this honorable House as well as to myself, to court and challenge the fullest investigation into these genreputation of a man, whether in public or private life, society alone recognizes its worthy member, and without a good name man is merely a physical automaton. For the preservation of a good name and an honorable and social recognition by society and friends and good people generally, a true man will make every sacrifice, not counting life itself even too dear.

Sir, I approach this subject with much seriousness and mortification, but with the consciousness of rectitude within myself; and with the shield of innocence before me and the sword of truth in my hand I here step forward and invite the enemies and conspirators who have concocted this crusade against me to the freest combat, "and damned be he who cries enough."

If the House will indulge me for a few statements in the premises will unveil the true character and complexion of this onslaught upon myself.

Sir, this is a warfare within the ranks of my own political party, waged against me from feelings of personal malice and rivalry, the theater of which has now been transferred by my accusers from the borders of our own State to the Halls of this House. Here is the battle-ground selected by my personal enemies within my own political household; and here on this scene, by the invincible power of truth and justice, I will be enabled, as I have done elsewhere, to rout these calumniators root and branch.

Who are my accusers, as represented by this extract from the Star? Acting-Governor M. L. Stearns, of my State, and a Mr. Martin, his loyal henchman.

Sir, as this case is now destined to acquire a national notoriety, I beg the privilege of letting the country know who my assailants are, their character and position, that we may enter this contest equally in the full blaze of publicity into which they have dragged it.

In all human actions the motives are as various as the actions them-selves, but in this case there is but one motive on the part of my accusers: they strike maliciously at the hands of one who, in former years, raised them into positions far beyond their measure and comprehension, and from whom they also received political chastisements and humiliation of the most galling description. Why, sir, this man who is now by some inscrutable dispensation of rovidence acting as our governor is indebted alone to my personal friendship for his admission as a member into our constitutional convention in 1868, as upon my friendship depended his fate either of coming into notice or sinking back into obscurity, as in himself he combines no characteristics that would distinguish him above the common level. In 1872 this man was pressed forward by one of our then United States Senators for the republican nomination of governor, but his want of learning and caliber, and his unpopular record, were of such a character that the convention rebelled against both his master, the Senator, and the tool that was to be foisted upon the party, and in this opposition it was my fate to bear no insignificant part. My vehement objections then were based upon his lack of qualifications, he being a man with very limited education, with no reputable associations, without sagacity or knowledge, with no accomplishments of person or mind, and with no fixed principles except those of avarice and stupidity.

It was then well known and substantiated that while this now acting governor was agent of the Freedmen's Bureau in the State he swindled the freedmen out of quantities of provisions which the Government charitably contributed in those unsettled days to keep from starvation the then newly freed people, a portion or quantity of which he from time to time sold for money to the planters, thus shamefully swindling both a beneficent Government and the deserving and suffering objects of this beneficent kindness. This record was too damaging to obtain for him the coveted nomination of governor, but by some injudicious compromise he was at that time nominated for lieutenant-governor.

What strange, fantastic tricks does destiny play with States as well as with individuals! Who could then have divined that Providence had in store for us the infliction of this obesity of incompetency as our future governor? The unfortunate death of Governor Hart in 1874 precipitated this phlegmatic incubus upon our State; and as South Carolina once had its Moses, and New York its Tweed, so Florida has now its Stearns.

Even now this embodiment of our political woes is attempting to run his administration without the check or co-operation of the legislative department of the State government. By a technicality in a new amendment to our State constitution the regular session of our Legislature could not convene in January last, and it became therefore the constitutional duty of the governor to call an extra session to provide for the current expenditures of the year 1876, but from some in-definable fear he refuses to call such extra session, and our State is left in the strange anomaly of being without any appropriations for this current year, and his term of office expires at the meeting of the next regular Legislature. A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and the indignation among all good people in our State, irrespective of party, is justly great and severe against such an unprecedented and arbitrary administration of a people's government.

Sir, in 1874, when I was the regular candidate for re-election to the Forty-fourth Congress, the combined opposition of his whole administration was turned against me. He induced a petty bolt from the regular nomination, forcibly expelled from the halls of the State capitol the regular convention, by issuing an official proclamation against its sitting, and which proclamation of ejectment he executed at the hands of the highest military officer of his cabinet, the adjutant-general of the State. This force contest was then carried throughout eral of the State. This fierce contest was then carried throughout the district, and for six weeks the most exciting campaign prevailed that probably ever occurred in the annals of any State whose Rrepresentatives here assemble.

The unjustifiable character of this political warfare upon me may best be characterized when I state that the leading democratic newspaper in my district published at the time its well-grounded apprehensions that I was hourly in danger of assassination in the fury of

After just six weeks of the most horrible political ebullition and onslaught waged upon the regular candidate by every device of hate, malice, rivalry, and animosity, and with a fury that could not be excelled by fiends, I routed this governor and his cohorts, horse, foot, and dragoons, and he sued for amity and peace; but not until the execrations of the people were so deep and loud that an audience in his own county refused to hear him, jeered, and almost mobbed him. Sir, I then gave blows and took blows such as no member within the sound of my voice ever encountered in politics; and I now blush for sound of my voice ever encountered in politics; and I now blush for the fact that we have a chief magistrate upon the neck of our State whose unbridled passions and uncivilized conduct could make such scenes and experience possible in one of the most progressive and inviting States in the American Union.

I was returned to this Congress by a constituency which fully decided the merits and issues between myself and my archenemy, but it is well known that this issue will have to be fought over again this year, for in spite of all repudiation and execration this uncivilized monster in our politics is even now attempting to procure a political indorsement for the purpose of prolonging his rule over our betrayed and misgoverned State.

Ah! here is the coming "tug of war," and here is the motive of this wicked assault upon my character and reputation as a member of this honorable body.

Mr. Martin, my other accuser, is the hireling of this governor, holding an appointment from his master which, under his peculiar management, is worth at least $10,000 a year, besides having the whole force of the penitentiary convicts, over whom he is warden, to build houses and cultivate vineyards for him.

Why, sir, this same henchman of his I carried into the State Legislature in 1874 by in person begging the county nominating convention to nominate him for the lower house, as the convention were my friends, and his unpopularity was so stupendous that it required all my friendship and persuasion to "boost" him even into the lower my friendship and persuasion to "boost" him even into the lower house. I begged his nomination at the hands of the convention as a personal boon to myself, and upon which consideration alone it was granted; and now this ingrate turns upon me, his benefactor, and forces the exclamation to my lips, "Et tu, Brute?"

But, sir, the cruel gauntlet is thrown down, not at my feet, but upon me, with the malicious intention to injure me in the estimation of my colleagues on this floor, in the estimation of all good men, and in the cherished esteem of my friends both in and out of this Chamber, and Leannet do otherwise than accent this wager of political battle, and

I cannot do otherwise than accept this wager of political battle, and the bitter necessity of vindicating my character, both of which have

And in conclusion, in justice to the expectation of my friends and the emotion of my own feelings, I will simply add that there is not the first scintilla of truth in these base charges, no odds how extensive and complicated this conspiracy may be against me, and I here voluntarily pledge my honor as a man, and my affection for my wife and babies, upon the truth of this declaration, and upon which this House will in time bear me testimony.

I now challenge, sir, my malicious enemies to the fullest investigation, relying only upon truth and probity, and upon that just verdict which I feel any committee and this House will award me.

I now request, sir, that a special committee, as the regular committees are fully engaged on other subjects, of seven or nine may be appointed by the Chair for the speedy investigation of these accusations; and I beg, as a favor personal to myself, that my fellow-members and the representatives of the press may suspend all judgment and criticism until the final report in this case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida, [Mr. Purman,] who has just made before the House a personal explanation, requests the House to order the appointment of a select committee, to consist of

House to order the appointment of a select committee, to consist of seven members, to investigate the charges against him that have been made in prints of his State.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think—

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds the Chair desires, with the leave of the House, to express an opinion which has been forced upon him by close observation of proceedings in this House for many years. It is that after the House is fully organized into standing and select committees, as it usually is at the outset of the Congress, all subsequent creations of select committees tend only to weaken the general effectiveness of the body, and that it is better that all matters of this kind should be referred by order of the House to some one of the committees already organized.

Mr. PURMAN. Allow me to add that when I made the request for a special committee it was only on the supposition that all the regular committees were even more than overworked with other matters, and I thought the appointment of a select committee would be a relief to the regular committees. I make no objection to any committee which the Chair may designate.

The SPEAKER. But all select committees must be composed of members of the regular committees; and just so far as those committees are thus broken up and the continuity of their labor interfered with, the effectiveness and progress of the work of the House is obstructed

Mr. WHITTHORNE. May I be indulged in a remark? I think I am at liberty to say that during the progress of the investigation being made by the Committee on Naval Affairs there have been developed certain facts which—I express only my individual opinion-do affect the character of the Representative from Florida. We hav do affect the character of the Representative from Florida. We have not felt at liberty—at least I have not felt at liberty—to prosecute the matter so far as he was individually concerned, but only so far as the question affected the general service of the country.

I may be permitted to add that, from the proof taken by our committee, I think it eminently proper that the official relations and conduct of the Representative from Florida should be investigated.

Whether it shall be the pleasure of the House to charge the Commit-Whether it shall be the pleasure of the House to charge the Commit-tee on Naval Affairs with the investigation of this individual matter is a question somewhat indifferent to myself. I know that we have a great deal of labor imposed upon us already; and yet I know that in part proof has been taken which does affect that Representative; and in some other mode I had proposed for myself and on behalf of the committee to bring the matter to the notice of the House so as to have the attention of that Representative. Having made this statement, I repeat that it is a matter of indifference to me whether that committee shall be charged with this special duty or a select committee raised for the purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As this case has been investigated in part by the Naval Committee, I move that it be referred to that com-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reference of this investigation with the usual powers to the Committee on Naval Affairs!

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have no interest in this matter—no possible interest in the world. Yet it seems to me that, if I were interested in it, terest in the world. Yet it seems to me that, if I were interested in it, I should object to being tried in this special case by the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee, as has been stated by its distinguished chairman, [Mr. Whitthorne,] has already taken testimony in relation to this very matter, and without the knowledge or presence of the gentleman most deeply interested. Therefore I think it would not be fair, it would not be just, that he should be cited to his trial before that tribunal.

M. HUMAN. The gentleman from Marriand [Mr. O'RRINNA] has before that tribunal.

Mr. PURMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] has relieved me of a load; and I now feel at liberty to make a few expressions which gentlemen will recognize as at least proper, even if not good policy. There is probably a delicacy in this matter, so far as the Naval Committee is concerned. I do not cast any reflections whatever upon the committee, personally or collectively. But, sir, I am the peer of every other member on this floor. I am not the servant of this House; and I affirm, feeling that I am backed up by every authority of parliamentary law and practice in the whole history of the world, that a member of a legislative body cannot be secretly investigated by any committee. The first information I had of this proceeding was through the public press. To carry on a surreptitious investigation, behind the back of a member who has no opportunity to be present by person or by counsel, is a star-chamber proceeding to be present by person or by counsel, is a star-chamber proceeding unparalleled in the history of this country. If I belonged to the executive branch of this Government, and were a servant of this House, I would recognize the propriety and fitness of carrying on an investigation of this kind; but, since my friend from Maryland has relieved me in this matter, I cannot help giving now expression to my feel-ings; and I say it was indelicate at least that I, as a member of this House, the peer of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the peer of every member of that committee, should first learn of this secret investigation into my official character when I saw it in the public press. I make no objection at all, but I must express my seuse public press. I make no objection at all, but I must express my sense of the indelicacy of this proceeding. I am ready at any time to go before that committee or any other committee.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is, or must be, evident to this House that the Committee on Naval Affairs, charged with the general duty to inquire into any errors, abuses, or frauds connected with the public service in relation to the Department which was especially committed to their aboves, would have to investigate for instance, what discoto their charge, would have to investigate, for instance, what disposition was made of the public money appropriated by law for the timber lands in the State of Florida reserved for naval purposes. It is further evident to this House that it was the duty of this committee to investigate the disposition of the appropriation made for the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I have to say that, in the discharge of a public duty and in the investigation of these affairs, unfortunately for that Representative, his name appeared in that connection, and not because he was an individual member. I may be allowed to say further that it was not surreptitious, not secret, not a star-chamber proceeding, but because, in the investigation of fraud and corruption, that individual happened to be in the way, and he was developed in that matter

Mr. PURMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.
Mr. PURMAN. Would it not be proper, if any charges were made or any rumors were in circulation which would justify an investigation against a sitting member upon this floor—who, I repeat, is the peer of every other member—would it not be proper, before any investigation every other member—would it not be proper, before any investigation could be made against such a member, that some one here would take the responsibility of rising upon this floor and state the charges upon his own responsibility, or as a matter of common rumor, so that then, in a public manner, such charges and allegations could be made here and referred to the appropriate committee for investigation as to their truth or falsity? I protest against a member being taken up in this back-handed way, and being investigated so that the first information has set in reference to the matter is from the public press. World it he gets in reference to the matter is from the public press. Would it not have been the proper way when my name came before the Committee on Naval Affairs—and I know that committee has a carte blanche in reference to all these investigations—to have stopped the matter right there, and said: These facts involve a sitting member, the peer of any member upon this floor, and let us notify him so he may come in person, or by counsel, to defend himself against any ex parte testi-

Mr. WHITTHORNE. We were not to be led off and we were not led off by the appearance of that gentleman's name. It was an accident to the committee, and it is due to myself while I am up and to its members to state that, in the judgment of the Committee on Naval Affairs so far as I know, the matter became public not through any member of the committee or officer of that committee, but according to my information through the witnesses themselves who had been before that committee.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say a word. I remember the general order to which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has referred, and it might be supposed that it gave them authority to examine into any charge arising from any quarter. Still, sir, it is a matter of constant usage on the part of the House whenever in the proceedings of a committee the name of a member is mentioned in such a manner as to require his attention that he should receive immediate notice of it. Of course there could be no censure passed upon the committee for proceeding without notice, but still the member from Florida under the circumstances would be entitled according to the usages of the House to receive such notice at once.

I did not rise to speak on this matter particularly. The member from Florida has asked for a special committee, while on the other hand it has been suggested that the investigation be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. For myself, I would like to have the privilege of voting on the request of the gentleman from Florida, and then on the other proposition. I hope it will be put to the House in

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, personally I have no feeling in connection with the question of a special committee, but it appears to me as though it would be improper that the investigation of these charges against the member from Florida should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It seems to me the reference ought to be made to a committee which has heard nothing delivered under oath affecting the integrity of that member. I think that gentleman ought to go before a committee that should possess all the qualifica-tions that the lowest criminal in the land is entitled to demand when a charge of a criminal nature is preferred against him and he is arraigned before a criminal tribunal of the country, and that is a body of inquisitors or triers who have not heard any facts sworn or unsworn or formed any opinion. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs had made the statement in the presence of the House that evidence had been produced pending another investigation before that committee which affected the personal integrity of the gentleman from Florida, and that that evidence had made such a lodgment in his mind that he felt it would require some explanation at the hands of that gentleman.

If that be the case, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it would be an act of indelicacy on the part of the House to send the investigation of those charges to a committee that had heard the evidence, at least in part, which would constitute a portion of the body of the proof that would be introduced before that committee which would have charge of the investigation in regard to the gentleman from Florida. I submit, not that it ought necessarily to be referred to a select committee, but that it ought to be referred at least to some committee who—and I do not make any imputation against these gentlemen—have and I do not make any imputation against these gentlemen—have not heard any portion of the sworn testimony tending to criminate the gentleman from Florida, delivered under the solemn sanction of an oath; because I know, however upright, however impartial, how-ever pure-minded we may be, that sworn evidence delivered before us when we are acting in a judicial capacity necessarily leaves an impression upon our minds however we may struggle to free ourselves

I wish to state about this unpleasant matter that this testimony was developed in the committee not while investigating the character of the gentleman from Florida, but while investigating abuses in the Navy, as we were charged with doing by the voice of this House, both as to its personnel and its materiel—this testimony was developed that was prejudicial to the character of the gentleman from Florida; and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee brought the question before the committee whether it was not proper to come into the House and report that fact to the House, that a committee of investigation might be demanded by the gentleman from Florida or that one might be appointed to take charge of the investigation.

My recollection of the matter is that his name appeared in several things that the committee investigated, and that it was apprehended on the part of some of the committee that before we got through with it other witnesses, whom we desired to get to further our investigation into these other abuses, might have knowledge of it by the report made to the House and get themselves out of the way, as other witnesses had done in cases of other abuses we were investigating. That was the reason why the matter was not reported to the House before. That would have been done at the proper time. Mr. HARRISON. Ithink the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] has entirely mistaken the character and duties of an investigating committee. He seems to think that this committee may act as a jury. The House will be the jury before whom the gentleman from Florida will obtain the verdict. This committee is composed of the peers of that gentleman. Honorable men, on whose minds we have no right to suppose there is a prejudice by reason of facts coming to them, are now investigating this matter. They will simply bring before this body facts, and this body will decide upon the merits presented

If a committee were ordered by this House to investigate the charges, would the Chair appoint the committee all of one side? Would he appoint a committee favorable to the gentleman? Would he not, in fact, appoint a committee known to have the facts? Is not that the duty of the Chair appointing an investigating committee, to appoint a committee known to have the facts, although those facts would be prejudicial? I caunot see that there is any objection to this committee continuing the investigation and then present it before the House, who, and not this committee, will act as the jury.

Mr. HURLBUT rose.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HURLBUT. I yield to the gentleman, retaining the floor.
Mr. WHITTHORNE. After the remarks made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] who has announced to the House what was my own judgment and feeling inside of the committee, I wish to say that I shall desire at the proper time, not that the Committee on Naval Affairs should be directed to investigate any matter connected with the gentleman from Florida, but that the facts should be reported to the House and the matter referred to a select committee, or to another and different standing committee of the House.

I happen to know, and I desire the House to understand, that there are suggestions outside of matters connected with the naval service in which it has been suggested that the name of the gentleman from Florida occurs. For this and for other reasons, and more particularly on account of what has been said this morning, I think it better that this matter should be referred to some other standing committee or to a select committee. I desire that for myself, and I think this would be outside of the appropriate business of my committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is right.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. And whether that shall be done by a select committee or by one of the regular committees is the question. simply make the suggestion now that it may be put in the form of a motion, that either the Committee upon the Post-Office Department or the Committee on Elections take charge of this matter.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire the House to consider this question of privilege not merely with reference to the individual case that may happen to be up, but in the broader scope in which it interests and concerns every member of the House. And I wish to say, sir, in the first place, that, as I understand the sentiment of the people of the country, the whole system of secret investigation, unless it is compelled by a stringent necessity, is abhorrent to the public mind. There are times and occasions on which secrecy must prevail, but to make it the rule to hide the action of any committee of this House from the public is in my judgment an error, an error of policy, an error of prac-

In this case almost the whole object I had in rising has been met by the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Whitthorne,] the chairman of the Naval Committee. From my memory of the rules and precedents upon this question it is undoubtedly an invasion of the rights of any member of this House for any committee collaterally or directly to inquire into his public conduct without giving him upon the instant that he is attacked the opportunity of being present. is not only a violation of the rule, as I understand it, and of clear law, but a violation of sound policy, and also of the courtesy which should prevail among all members who stand upon an equality upon this floor. It is a violation, as I have stated, of the precedents beyond all doubt. And those precedents seem to me to be founded on rules of fairness, equity, and justice, but which we ought all to carry out without reference to any special case.

I hope, therefore, that the proposition which has been made, that this question shall be referred to some other committee than the one which has collaterally taken it up, may prevail.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I suggest that the matter be referred to the

Mr. KASSON. That is a very good suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida accept the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to his resolution?

Mr. PURMAN. Any committee at all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. PURMAN. I simply want a thorough and full investigation at the hands of any committee who have leisure to make it, and probably the committee suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee has more leisure than any other. I am certainly willing to submit to investigation by them, and I therefore accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the House to this mat-

Mr. HOAK. I wish to call the attention of the House to this matter as it is very important in forming precedents. I think that the charges to be investigated should distinctly appear. I suppose the charges contained in the paragraph which the gentleman has had read should be made the basis of the investigation, and if other charges against the gentleman shall be developed in the examination, the jurisdiction of the committee can be enlarged. It does not do to put the charge in a general form, and therefore I suggest that the charges contained in the paragraph read be referred.

Mr. PIRMAN. Or any other charges my enemies may trump up

Mr. PURMAN. Or any other charges my enemies may trump up against me.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that would be a good precedent. If the gentleman's enemies trump up other charges, why, the House can enlarge the jurisdiction of the committee by referring those charges to committee

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the charge briefly stated to be this: a charge of a corrupt sale of a naval cadetship. That, the Chair believes, is all the newspaper in substance charges, and the Chair understands that the subject-matter to be referred to the committee is that.

Mr. HOAR. Then I suggest that it be referred by resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the charge against the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Purman] of a corrupt sale of a naval cadetship be referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform.

Mr. PURMAN. But in justice to myself I am willing to stand by the record as I presented it to the House. That extract from the newspaper embodied three or four allegations, such as selling offices, &c., and I hope my friends will take me right upon the whole broad platform.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the reading of the extract from the newspaper.

Mr. PURMAN. I desire to stand upon what I introduced here, although I am much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. In a moment the paper will be here and the ex-

The SPEAKER. Not the Clerk.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee on Enrolled Bills had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuation of the work on the building for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri; and

An act (H. R. No. 2282) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The Sergeant-at-Arms is at the bar of the House with the witness whose arrest was ordered by the House yesterday.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Alcaeus B. Wolfe, and said: In obedience to the order of the House, I now have in custody at its bar Alcaeus B. Wolfe.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs and of the witness, I desire to state to the House that at the meeting of that committee this morning a deputy sergeant-at-arms brought him to the committee-room. Upon being brought into the presence of the committee, the witness stated that he was willing to answer the questions propounded to him by the committee, to tell all he knew and to answer such questions as the committee might propound to him. The committee then took the question into consideration and resolved, from motives of public policy, although he was then in the custody of the House of the House, fell to the floor in a fit.

At this moment the witness, who was seated in a chair at the bar

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire whether there happens to be on the floor or in the gallery of the House at this time a physi-

Mr. HUNTON. There is a physician present, Dr. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, a member of this House.

Mr. Henkle, and Dr. Wallace of Pennsylvania, were promptly in attendance upon the witness.

Mr. WADDELL. I suggest that the witness be carried into an ante-om. It would only be an act of humanity. Mr. HUNTON. The physicians are managing the case, and he will be removed when proper.

After some delay the witness was carried from the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The House will now please be in order, so that business may be resumed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I had just stated that the committee, from motives of public policy, thought that it was proper to go on with the examination of the witness, he being willing, as he expressed it, to answer such questions as might be propounded to him. They resolved, however, that it was their duty, inasmuch as the witness was in the custody of the House, that he should be brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms and, under a resolution which I was instructed to prepare, discharged from arrest. The witness was acquainted with the fact that he would be discharged upon coming before the House.

It is proper that I should say now here, in view of what has transpired, that the witness in his examination before us this morning developed a great tendency to the disease called "palpitation of the heart," and in one or more instances had to near the palpitation of the heart," and in one or more instances had to pause for relief.

He has answered, in the opinion of the committee, all the questions they thought necessary and proper to propound to him; and in view of that fact the committee has instructed me to offer this order:

It appearing to the House that Mr. A. B. Wolfe has appeared before the House Naval Committee and answered all questions that were propounded to him by the committee, it is therefore ordered by the House that the witness, Alcaeus B. Wolfe, be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and ordered before the committee for such other and further examination as the committee may choose to make touching matters before them by the order of this House.

The last expression in the resolution was inserted for this purpose, that in the event the committee should hereafter have occasion for this witness the subpœna issued by your order, sir, should hold him; and if he should disappear or fail to come before the committee he could be further punished for contempt in failing to answer the sub-pæna of the House. We have taken that measure as a matter of

Mr. KASSON. How does that last clause of the resolution read?

The Clerk read as follows:

And ordered before the committee for such other and further examination as they may choose to make touching the matter before them by order of this House.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. We desire to avoid the complication that

Mr. WHITHORNE. We desire to avoid the completation that might arise if the House absolutely discharges the witness.

Mr. KASSON. That is the very point to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention. By simply providing for the discharge of the witness from arrest under the order of the House of such date, it leaves him in the power of the committee. It is a mere simple discharge from arrest, and then he is completely in the power of the morning shall remain in the possession of that committee alone, and for the time kept secret.

Mr. KASSON. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHIT-THORNE] think it would be better to modify his resolution so as to discharge the witness from the arrest made by the order of the House on yesterday?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My friend will appreciate my reason for having added what I did to the resolution in view of any criticism that might be made hereafter.

Mr. KASSON. If it is safer I have no objection; but I think the other form the better.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I now call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the formality of the previous question is not required. The question will be upon adopting the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

ABUSES AND FRAUDS IN NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution that the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to make an examination into alleged abuses and frauds in the navy-yards at Kittery, Maine, and Boston, Massachusetts, at the places named. I think that there will be no objection to the resolution when it is read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the Committee of this House on Naval Affairs to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the House resolution instructing them to inquire into certain alleged abuses and frauds at the different navy-yards of the United States, and the misapplication of appropriations made for the construction of eight vessels of war authorized by act of Congress approved February 10, 1873, &c., it is hereby directed that said committee, through the subcommittee appointed for that purpose, consisting of Messrs. Mills, Bulkleigh, and Jones, shall make said investigation, as far as it relates to the Kittery navy-yard, at the said yard; and, so far asit relates to the Charlestown navy-yard, that the subcommittee of said committee, consisting of Messrs. Mills, Harris, and Jones, shall conduct said investigation at said last-mentioned navy-yard.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was rearticles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, have instructed me to submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary would respectfully report that, in pursuance of the instructions of the House, they have prepared articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, but that, since preparing the same, they have been informed and believe that Caleb P. Marsh, upon whose testimony before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and referred to them by the House, said articles were framed, has gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and that probably his attendance as a witness before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment cannot be procured; and that they are also informed and believe that other evidence may be procured sufficient to convict said William W. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors in office as Secretary of War. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

**Resolved**, That the resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be recommitted to said committee with power to take further proof, to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time.

**Your committee, impressed with the importance of securing the fullest indemnity to such witnesses as may be required to testify in behalf of the Government before either House, or before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, would also recommend the immediate passage of the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases." They would further recommend that the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases." They would further recommend that the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill to protect witnesses," be introduced, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, w

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases.

Be it enacted, dec., That whenever any person shall be required to testify against his protest before either House of Congress or any committee thereof, or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and shall so testify under protest, he shall not thereafter be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture, on account of any fact or act concerning which he shall be so required to testify: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to relieve any person from liability to impeachment.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. KNOTT] if section 859 of the Revised Statutes does

mr. KNOTT. I will answer that question before I get through.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2573) in relation to witnesses.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who shall willfully absent himself from his place of residence, or conceal himself, or absent himself from the United States, or being absent shall willfully remain absent, or shall flee or attempt to do so, for the purpose and with the intent to escape the service of any lawful writ or process requiring him to appear and testify, or give evidence or produce books, letters, documents, or papers, or for the purpose and with the intent to avoid being required to testify or give evidence, or to become a witness, shall be deemed guilty of a crime punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding three years, or by both of said punishments. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt any such person from lawful punishment as for a contempt.

Mr. KNOTT. On Thursday last there was read to the House the testimony of Caleb P. Marsh, taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department; and although it was not perhaps as specific in many particulars as it might have been made upon a more thorough and searching examination, it disclosed facts sufficient to satisfy the mind of every gentleman on this floor that the late Secre-tary of War should be at once impeached at the bar of the Senate for high crimes and misdemeanors, which by a unanimous vote of the House was accordingly done, and the evidence referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to prepare and report to the House suitable articles of impeachment.

The committee proceeded at once to the discharge of that duty, the committee proceeded at once to the discharge of that duty, but they had no sooner completed it than they were confronted by a fact with which every reader of the daily papers from Cape Cod to the Golden Gate, and from the Bay of Fundy to the Rio Grande was apprised; namely, that the witness Caleb P. Marsh had fled the jurisdiction of the United States. What may have been the immediate cause of his precipitate flight I will not undertake to say. I will say, however, that having testified before a committee of this House in obedience to its subpresses and having been sailty of the content of the c obedience to its subpena, and having been guilty of no contempt of the House, and having given no indication of an intention on his part to commit any such contempt, it was beyond the power either of the Committee on the Expenditures in the War Department or of the House itself to have ordered him into custody or in any manner to have restrained him of his liberty, without being guilty of almost as great an outrage as that charged upon the Secretary of War; that of arbitrarily depriving a citizen of his liberty without authority of law.

Upon the facts to which he testified becoming public, however, he could have been taken into custody and held in pursuance of law by another department of the Government. I will not insinuate that the distinguished head of the Department of Justice or the district attorney for the District of Columbia were not aware of the proper mode and manner of securing the detention of his person.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KNOTT. I decline to yield for the present.

Mr. PAGE. Does not the gentleman know that this man had escaped before these officers had official knowledge of it?

Mr. KNOTT. I will say, however, that an ordinary county attorney who, having knowledge of the commission of a crime which by law it was his duty to prosecute, and who would blazon to the world his intention of arresting and bringing to punishment all parties con-cerned in it so that they might have full notice of it, instead of quietly going to the proper officer and procuring a warrant for the arrest of the guilty parties instead of giving them notice to flee—I would say he should be dismissed from office on account of incompetency. But this by the way.

With the witness Marsh beyond the jurisdiction of the Government, we know, as every lawyer on this floor and throughout the country who is familiar with the facts must know, that a prosecution based upon the facts disclosed by his testimony could not be successively. fully maintained without other evidence. The necessity therefore of bringing that witness back, or of procuring other witnesses by whose testimony the charge might be substantiated, became at once obvious. But how were we to get him?

It is impossible for Marsh to be brought back under our extradition treaty with Great Britain. The Webster and Ashburton treaty of treaty with Great Britain. The Webster and Ashburton treaty of 1842, which contains all the stipulations on that subject, provides upon this point as follows:

It is agreed that the United States and Her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisition by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of false paper, within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territory of the other.

It is obvious to most minds that the charge against the witness Marsh, even were he indicted, does not fall within the catalogue of offenses herein enumerated for which a party may be extradited.

It was, however, suggested on yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] that Marsh might be indicted for robbery and extradited upon that charge. The suggestion appeared robbery and extradited upon that charge. The suggestion appeared to me to be rather singular, coming from so distinguished an authority. Even if the gentleman's legal investigations have carried him so far that he has forgotten the lessons he learned when studying the elementary principles of law, he could have looked into Webster's Unabridged Dictionary and found that robbery consists in taking from another his personal property by violence or force; "the forcible and felonious taking from the person of another any money or ble and felonious taking from the person of another any money or goods, putting him in fear," &c.

When asked if Mr. Marsh had been guilty of robbery, he suggested that he had been in a "conspiracy to rob several companies of United States cavalry." The gentleman from Maine may be right, and Mr. Marsh, after all, may have been guilty of "robbing several companies of United States cavalry," though I hardly think it very complimentary to their courage to suggest that several companies of United States cavalry were put in bodily fear and stripped of their property by a single man.

It is perfectly plain therefore that the witness cannot be brought back under this extradition treaty. In fact, as the law now is, there is but one method by which he can be brought back; but in my opinion that is an infallible one. And, moreover, it is in the power of one man in the Government to have the witness Marsh in Washington within forty-eight hours if he so desires. The plan by which he can effect that object so much to be desired at this time may not be known perhaps to the Attorney-General though I rather expressible in It is perhaps to the Attorney-General, though I rather suspect it is. It is a very simple one, and one which has been known to the profession a very simple one, and one which has been known to the profession and practiced from the earliest period in the history of our jurisprudence. What is it? Simply this: If the President of the United States really desires honestly and sincerely that his late Secretary of War, whose enormous crimes have disgraced his own Administration and caused the cheek of every American citizen to mantle with shame, shall be brought to justice, shall be indicted and convicted before a jury, as well as successfully impeached, all he has to do is to give his assurance to the witness Marsh that, if he will come before the tribunals of the country and sell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," he shall be free from arrest; and my word for it, Marsh will be here within forty-eight hours after he shall have re-Marsh will be here within forty-eight hours after he shall have received it.

But he is not coming without some such assurance; and there is no sane man in his situation who would, after what has been heralded through the press all over this country. And what is that ? The distinguished gentleman from Maine very emphatically denied on yes-terday that there had been any Cabinet meeting upon the subject of prosecuting Mr. Marsh or Mr. Belknap; he stated that the so-called Cabinet meeting was "manufactured by the newspapers," and that the subject of prosecuting any witness against Belknap had not been discussed by the Cabinet at all.

The gentleman from Maine knows better than I do about that matter, I suppose, but I find the following in the National Republican of last Saturday morning, and I believe that paper is the home organ of the Administration:

THE SESSION OF THE CABINET.

Yesterday's Cabinet session was marked as being one of the longest as well as the most earnest and distressing meeting that has taken place during the entire period of President Grant's administration. It was well enough understood that but one topic would engross its attention. While all the members of the Cabinet have been positive in their condemnation of Mr. Belknap, there has been the most dispassionate consideration of his offense. There has been no manifestation of anything beyond an assumption of the full measure of responsibility the Administration feels it incumbent to exhibit in the case.

All the public Departments were represented, Mr. Robeson answering for both the Navy and the War Departments, Secretary Fish, Secretary Bristow, the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Interior completing the list of the President's official advisers. The President, sitting at the head of the long table in the executive office, addressed the Cabinet on the serious matter that every one felt should at once be met, and stating his indisposition to take any step which might or could be construed into a desire to persecute any one, and indicated at the same time very clearly, and with no little emphasis, his entire determination that the full punishment provided for in the laws should meet all offenders. In the President's expressions the complete essence of his famous and sententious remark, "Let no guilty man escape," met easy recognition. Upon the point as to what the duty of the Administration is, there was found no difference of opinion in the Cabinet. It is the saddest duty and the sorest trial that has yet had to be met, but with all that it will be met, and without a single moment of unnecessary delay.

As the law officer of the Government the Attorney-General was called upon for an expression of what was the proper method of proceeding in the institution of the criminal proceedings against General Belkmap and those who have been associated with him in the President had no idea of making discriminations in the trial of offenders, and those who have been particeps criminis with the Ex-Secretary will be certain to feel their proportionate share of the odium and punishment their faults bring with

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here f Mr. KNOTT.

Mr. KNOTT. After what occurred here yesterday, the gentleman from Maine must excuse me. In this connection I will remark that what struck me most of all the incidents connected with the famous Beecher scandal was the generous disposition of Mrs. Moulton to "give the old man a chance." I would love above all things to give the gentleman from Maine a chance, because he seems never to have a chance upon this floor. [Laughter.]

Now this Cabinet meeting may not have taken place; the gentle-man from Maine knows better than I do about it; but I will read further from this account as given in the Republican:

The determination was reached, after some discussion on the peculiar points of the bribery case, so different as they are held to be from an ordinary case of this character, to commence criminal proceedings just as soon as the facts attending the matter can be put in shape to be sworn to. This will be given immediate consideration by Judge Pierrepont, who will probably have an interview to-day with United States Attorney Wells in relation to the unhappy business.

Now, gentlemen on the other side know more about this than I do: but whoever penned this article knew more about it than any of us perhaps; for upon the very same day that this appeared in the Republican, and within a few hours afterward, I received from the Attorney-General a letter, from which I will read:

DEAR SIR: The bearer is Hon. H. H. Wells, United States attorney for this District. He calls upon you in relation to recent violations of the statutes by General Belkmap and others. We have examined the law; and there is no doubt that they have grossly violated it, if reports are true.

I read this simply by way of showing a singular coincidence at least. But whether there was a Cabinet meeting or not, here is notice given to the world, notice especially given to Mr. Marsh and all others who may have had any complicity in these corruptions, "Just so sure as you exhibit yourselves in the investigation of these transactions the same punishment shall be meted out to you as to principal offenders." Under these circumstances, how can we expect that Marsh will come back here, or that any other witness who values his own personal liberty will ever venture to testify in this matter without having some assurance of immunity.

But the gentleman from California [Mr. Page] asked me a while ago whether the law does not already give this immunity. I answer, no. I will read the section to which he refers, section 859 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

No testimony given by a witness before either House or before any committee of either House of Congress shall be used in evidence—

shall be used in evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. But an official paper or record produced by him is not within said privilege.

Now that is precisely the English rule. Nevertheless, in England as here, a witness can decline to give an answer, notwithstanding his evidence cannot be used against him in a criminal prosecution, because his answer may indicate other evidence that will be competent against him and upon which he may be convicted. Consequently, in the British Parliament, for a great number of years the practice has been in such cases to pass for each particular case a special act of indemnity, as stated in the work on the Law and Practice in Legislative Assemblies, by L. S. Cushing, section 1005, which I will read:

In the House of Lords, although the same power clearly exists to compel the answer of a witness to criminate himself, and although the rule above mentioned is recognized, namely, that evidence taken at the bar cannot be used against a witness, yet, as such evidence may lead to the discovery of other evidence sufficient to convict them, the protection afforded by the rule alluded to—

does not seem to be regarded as adequate; and it has accordingly been the practice for many years, when the evidence of such witnesses is about to be taken, to pass an act (which is of course agreed to by the Commons) to indemnify them in the fullest manner against the consequences of their evidence.

By the act of Congress passed in 1857 it was provided that-

No person examined and testifying before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, shall be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for any fact or act touching which he shall be required to testify before either House of Congress or any committee of either House as to which he shall have testified, whether before or after the date of this act; and that no statement made or paper produced by any witness before either House of Congress or before any committee of either House shall be competent testimony in any criminal proceeding against such witness in any court of justice.

Now, with these facts before the committee, that the only witness by whom the charges preferred against General Belknap upon which they were instructed to prepare articles can be established, either before a court of impeachment or in the District court upon an indictment, was beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and that he probably would not come back without indemnity, the question presented itself to your committee what it was most advisable for the House to do, informed as they were and believing as they did there was an abundance of other testimony which might be procured by which those charges and perhaps others could be established. And after mature deliberation they reached the conclusion that to present articles of impeachment to be acted upon, and finally paraded before the Senate by the House, with a moral certainty that there would not be evidence enough to sustain them unless Marsh can be brought back or the facts shown by other evidence, would render them ridiculous in the eyes of the world as well as contemptible in their own estimations.

We deem it, therefore, advisable that the articles of impeachment, which we have prepared in obedience to instructions from the House, should not be presented until either the attendance of Marsh can be procured or the Committee on the Judiciary have had time to get other sufficient evidence to sustain them. We did not feel, and I do not believe there is a gentleman in this House who would feel, disposed to see the House place itself in the ridiculous attitude of parading charges without being prepared to prove them, when it is apparent, charges without being prepared to prove them, when it is apparent, or we have sufficient grounds to believe, that abundant evidence with proper opportunity may be procured to sustain them. The committee, therefore, make this report, asking that the matter be referred back to them; that they have authority to hear testimony, to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time; and that in the mean time, in order to facilitate this investigation and to facilitate other investigations, they report the bill indemnifying witnesses who shall be required in the interest of the Government to testify, from all liability to answer criminally in any court of justice, and against any forfeiture or penalty concerning any fact or act about which they may be called to testify

I now yield to my colleage on the committee from Wisconsin, [Mr.

LYNDE.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, the committee in this report have asked the House to recommit all matters pertaining to this impeachment, that they may be authorized to take testimony, to send for persons and papers, to report articles of impeachment to the House. It seems necessary from the persistent inquiries and demands of members upon this floor that articles should be reported at this time, subject to the order of the House. But, Mr. Speaker, why is it demanded that this hot haste should be made in this great case, involving the honor of the nation? Why is it required that articles of impeachment should be brought to the House on the testimony of Marsh alone-a single witness? From the testimony already presented to this House, it is apparent that there are other witnesses connected with that very transaction whose testimony is material and important in this case. And, sir, there is no precedent upon the House records of a committee being required to present articles of impeachment until after they had been authorized to send for persons and papers and to take testimony upon which to draw those articles of impeachment.

Mr. Speaker, for one I regret that there is so much manifestation of party feeling on this subject. Do gentlemen suppose that they can make this a party matter; that any member upon this floor can ride into the Presidency upon the manner in which this investition shall be conducted? Our national honor is involved in the mode in which this prosecution is presented, in which this investigamode in which this prosecution is presented, in which this investiga-tion is conducted, in which the trial before the United States Senate shall be had. Mr. Belknap is entitled to a fair and impartial trial. Party feelings ought not to control that trial; neither should they control this House as to the manner in which the impeachment articles should be presented to the Senate. The first impeachment case that came before the United States Senate was that of William Blount, a Senator of the United States. The attention of the House was called Senator of the United States. The attention of the House was called to the subject by a letter from the President of the United States, which was presented on the 7th of July, 1796. On the 8th of July, upon the information furnished in that communication, and a letter which was transmitted with the President's message to the House, the House passed a resolution impeaching William Blount. A committee was appointed to present that impeachment to the Senate. On the same day, the 8th of July, 1796, the Senate expelled William Blount from that body; and on the same day, the 8th of July, 1796, the House passed this resolution: the House passed this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemenors, and that the same committee have power to sit during the recess of Congress and to send for persons and papers and records.

This committee reported to the next Congress. Congress met on the second Monday of November, and the articles of impeachment were reported to the House on the 25th of January, 1797, and adopted, after discussion, on the 29th of January of that year. Here were more than six months given to the committee after the impeachment was presented to the Senate, to investigate, to prepare the testimony, and to prepare the articles of impeachment before they were presented to the Senate.

The next case was that of Judge Pickering. He was impeached before the Senate on the 3d of March, 1803, and a committee was appointed with power to send for persons and papers on the 20th of October, 1803, and on the 27th of December following, the committee reported, and reported articles of impeachment. There were nine reported, and reported articles of impeachment. There were nine months after Judge Pickering was impeached before the Senate be-fore the articles of impeachment were adopted by the House or presented to the Senate.

There have been but five cases, I believe. I have not investigated particularly into that subject, but my impression is that there have been but five cases of impeachment before the Senate of the United States since the formation of this Government.

The next case was that of Judge Chase. There was a resolution of inquiry introduced into the House on the 5th of January, 1804. A committee was appointed to investigate, and on the 12th of March the committee reported in favor of an impeachment. The testimony having been taken in full and at great length, it was reported to the House by the committee who were specially directed to investigate the subject, and on the 26th of March thereafter—fourteen days—the committee reported to the House articles of impeachment for its consideration.

Now the charges against Judge Chase were charges of record, re quiring but little investigation or very little testimony outside of the records before the court. But Congress adjourned when those articles of impeachment were reported, and met again on the 30th of November, 1804. After Congress met, Mr. Randolph, if I recollect aright, called the attention of the House to the articles of impeachment which had been reported at the previous session, and asked that they be re-committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they were so recommitted before they were adopted by the House, and they were adopted several days after that date.

The next case to which I call the attention of the House is that of Judge Peck. The memorial was presented to the House on the 9th of December, 1826. The House referred it to the Judiciary Committee. On the 15th of February thereafter, the Judiciary Committee of the House reported, recommending that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his memorial; which leave was granted. It was not presented at the next session, but at the session of Congress in 1828 it was again presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I read from the preliminary proceedings in the trial:

The following session, Mr. McDuffle, on the 15th of December, 1829, repeated the motion he had made at the last Congress, and the petition was once more referred to the Judiciary Committee, which now consisted of Messrs, Buchanan, Wickliffe, Storrs of New York, Davis of South Carolina, Bouldin, Ellsworth, and White of Louisiana. These gentlemen took up the subject with earnestness, and on the 7th of January ensuing, their chairman, Mr. Buchanan, moved that they be authorized to send for persons and papers. The motion was agreed to: witnesses were sent for and examined, and on the 23d of March following, Mr. Buchanan made a full report of the proceedings of the committee, exhibiting an abstract of the Soulard cause, (which had given rise to the proceedings,) together with the depositions of Luke Edward Lawless, the memorialist, &c.

Mr. Speaker, I have presented these authorities and precedents to this House for the purpose of showing that there is no necessity for this hot haste, or that articles of impeachment should be presented this not haste, or that articles of impeachment should be presented upon the testimony of a single witness after impeachment has been made by this House. It is a grave question, it is a national question, which should receive due consideration, and every step in the proceedings should be taken upon due deliberation. If Mr. Marsh had not left this country, if Mr. Marsh could be had as a witness to-day, I do not think this House would do justice to itself or to the country if it proceeded in this impeachment case on his testimony alone. It is possible that every member upon this floor may think that there is testimony enough in that case to impeach Mr. Bellynen, when the is testimony enough in that case to impeach Mr. Belknap; but that is not the question. We have impeached Mr. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and it is our duty as a House of Representatives to investigate into all the high crimes and misdemeanors of which he has been guilty while he has been in office, and which can come within our investigation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do insist that these articles of impeachment now reported by the Committee on the Judiciary should be recommitted to that committee, with authority to take testimony, send for persons and papers, and be authorized to report articles of impeachment to this House at such time as they may think best.

Mr. KNOTT. I now call the previous question on the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not attempt to limit the debate.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to refuse his associate on the committee an opportunity to

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox in the chair.) The gentle-man from Kentucky has demanded the previous question and debate is not in order.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question; and on a division the Chair announced that there were 80 votes in the affirmative.

Mr. CONGER. Before the negative vote is called I desire to ask if the previous question will be upon the resolution only?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be upon

Mr. KASSON. That covers it all.
Mr. CONGER. Does it apply to the consideration of the bills reported by the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that it does; the bills will come up immediately after the resolution has been disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Independent of the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Independent of the action on the res-

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand that the bills themselves will be subject to discussion? I do not know that there is any objection to the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question only applies to the resolution.

The negative vote not being called for, the previous question was seconded.

Mr. KASSON. I now ask the question whether the previous question is only on the motion to recommit?

Mr. KNOTT. It is on the resolution only, which is a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is only upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read, and then we shall understand matters.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMUNITY TO WITNESSES BEFORE INVESTIGATION COMMITTEES.

Mr. KNOTT. I now move the engrossment and third reading of the first bill reported by the committee, and upon it I will ask the previous question; and if the previous question shall be sustained, I will then yield a portion of the time to which I shall be entitled to my colleague on the committee [Mr. LAWRENCE] to discuss the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman not to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knort] presents, under the privilege granted to him, a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KASSON. It is in order to make an appeal on this question. Not one word of explanation has been heard of this bill, and I beg the gentleman not to insist upon the previous question when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has just expressed his regret at the haste the other day with which the articles of impeachment were adopted. It is but right that a little debate should be allowed before this bill is forced upon the House, and I appeal to the gentleman to

Mr. KNOTT. I simply desire to remark in answer to the gentleman from Iowa that I understood on yesterday that this bill was to be passed without a dissenting voice on the other side of the House and that we have been derelict in our duty in not having brought it in sooner. But I want to say this, that if gentlemen desire to debate the bill there will be an hour after seconding the previous question, if it shall be seconded, when gentlemen can be heard in opposition to

Mr. KASSON. The trouble is that that hour has been parceled out already.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky

yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. KNOTT. I have called the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I trust the Chair will not interpos I trust the Chair will not interpose to prevent the gentleman from yielding to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no power except to enforce the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We must have the bill read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been read a first and second me. The Chair rules that it has been read a first and second time time. The Chair rules that it has been read a first and second time unless objection was made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I make the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection comes too late now.

The question is upon seconding the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. On which bill? There are two; and the Chair ruled that the bill could not be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore If the gentleman wants the bill read for information it is never too late.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do want it read.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] that I wish to offer a substitute for the bill, which I now send up to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky

yield for that purpose?

Mr. KNOTT. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then I desire to ask the gentleman a

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield for that Mr. KASSON. I object, unless some time is allowed for discussion.

Mr. RASSON. I object, unless some time is anowed for discussion. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.
Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I merely desire to ask a question.
Mr. BLAINE, [to Mr. KASSON.] Object.
Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Why does not the gentleman object himself !

Mr. BLAINE. I do object, unless some debate is to be allowed on this side of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then why do not you take the responsibility of objecting yourself? The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question;

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question; and being taken, upon a devision there were—ayes 118, noes 9.

Mr. PAGE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, it is the duty of the Chair to order tellers.

Mr. BLAINE. There have been two speeches from the opposition side of the House. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] Every man here is in favor of this bill, but we want one speech on this question from this side of the House, there having been two speeches on that side. this side of the House, there having been two speeches on that side.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is now in order. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. Knott of Kentucky, and Mr. Blaine of Maine.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 109, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce that.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] will see the propriety of yielding a very few minutes to this side of the House. There is every disposition on this side to expedite the passage of the bill. For myself, I do not want to speak more than fifteen minutes at the outside.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. BLAINE. Not on seconding the previous question.
Mr. HOAR. Allow me to make a suggestion to which there will perhaps be no objection. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] who knows I am thoroughly in favor of his

Mr. BLAINE. So am I.
Mr. HOAR. And think it all right. There have been some suggestions made privately on both sides of the House upon one particular point in which this bill may be defective. I think the objection may be answered, but if the previous question shall now be seconded it will put it out of the power of the House to remedy that defect if one shall be discovered. I think the result of discussion will be a most triumphant answer to the objection. I suggest to the gentleman whether he cannot keep the control of this bill by having unanimous consent to take the floor at the end of ten or fifteen minuted. and call the previous question if he shall see fit to do so. I think that whole matter could be accomplished in less time than it would require to take the yeas and nays.

Mr. KNOTT. This is a matter which this side of the House are no more interested in than gentlemen on the other side—not one particle. It was announced on yesterday that there would be a unanimous concurrence in the passage of this bill. If they desire to concur, all right.

Mr. KASSON. Not on this bill, for I for one never heard it read.

Mr. KASSON. Not on this bill, for I for one never neard it read. It may be all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not now in order. The House having been found without a quorum, two motions only are in order, one for a call of the House and the other a motion to adjourn. Mr. BLAINE. A fifteen-minute speech would not take more than half the time required for a call of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clark proceeded to call the roll, and the following members

The call of the roll being concluded,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: This roll-call discloses the presence of two hundred and thirty-six members. One hundred and forty-seven constitute a quorum; so there is largely more than a quorum present.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Allow me to inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. KNOTT] whether it would not be better to allow some debate on this bill on this side of the House. Nothing has been said upon it here; and it is a bill of a good deal of importance. It is one that ought not to be passed hastily. While I am in favor of it, and shall speak in favor of it, it is one upon which members of the House have a right to be heard. I appeal to the gentleman to allow some discussion. some discussion.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 120, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. LAWRENCE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 116, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more disagreeable to this side of the House than anything that looks like filibustering.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is not in

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER protempore. It is not in order at this time, there being upon the last vote no quorum.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. COCHRANE. I call for the reading of Rule 31.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every member who shall be in the House when a question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only motions in order are for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. CLYMER. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division-ayes 105,

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does not the last vote disclose the presence of a quorum? If so, I submit that no call of the House is in order.
Mr. LAWRENCE. O, yes.
Mr. PARSONS. I call for the yeas and nays.
Mr. KELLEY, Mr. HARRISON, and others. Is there not a quorum

Mr. O'BRIEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on my motion to reconsider the vote ordering a call of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. What has become of my motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is still pending. The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered that there should be a call of the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House having ordered that there be a call of the House, the Clerk will now proceed to call the roll.

The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to Messrs. Bagby, George A. Bagley, William H. Mr. CLYMER. More than a quorum being present, I move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER protempore. The doors will be re-opened. The question now recurs on seconding the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to make an inquiry and a statement. It has been usual when a bill comes from a committee to allow the minority of that committee to have an opportunity to be heard. I understood the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to have stated at the opening of his remarks that he was willing to accord to the minority of the committee, no other member desiring to speak but myself, the right to occupy the House for half an hour, or to dispose of the time as I might deem proper. As far as I am concerned, I think we ought not to waste any further time, and I hope the House will now consent to dispose with all further proceedings in the call. The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has already been done.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then I hope the previous question will be sustained and the half hour be accorded to me in the closing of the debate, to dispose of as I may deem proper.

Mr. KNOTT. I made the statement that should the previous question be sustained I would yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, one half hour. That certainly was understood before all this filibustering commenced. I have reiterated the statement time and again, and have now no disposition to recede from that fair proposition. I am still willing to yield half an hour to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER protempore. This is all proceeding by unanimous consent, as debate is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman from Kentucky misunderstands the point. If I understand, he now desires the previous question shall be seconded first.

Mr. CLYMER. I object to further debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects, and debate is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. This is not debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is, and the gentleman is not in order. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is entitled to an hour, having man of the Committee on the Judiciary, is entitled to an hour, naving reported the bill, in which to close the debate.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield half an hour to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let me first ask a favor of the House. There has been a call of the House several times, and as I do not wish to seem to be in contempt of the House, having an important matter of business to attend to, I ask to be excused for the remainder of this days as the second of the remainder of this days. mainder of this day.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Before proceeding to say what I desire in regard to this bill, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday there were some things I thought ought to have been pardoned, owing to the excitement of the debate; some statements which I hardly expected to be renewed this mention and breach and allested this morning, and by so cool and collected a gentleman as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The statements to which I refer are those which concern an alleged effort on the part of the executive administration of this Government to terrify a witness or witnesses from appearing in Washington to sustain the prosecution. In the few moments allowed, sir, I have only to say that I have before me several of the papers which refer to that Cabinet meeting commented upon by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and showing such a condition of facts as to take all excuse based upon that fact from those gentlemen who yesterday and again this morning seemed to rest this action against the Administration.

On Thursday about three o'clock the witness was discharged from the committee and allowed, with his compensation in his pocket, to depart.

Mr. BLAINE. Before that. Mr. KASSON. And taking the first train for New York afterward

Mr. BLAINE. He left at one and a half o'clock on Thursday, three hours before the report was made in this House.

Mr. KASSON. It is stated that he left at midday, but I wish to give them the benefit—

Mr. BLAINE. He absolutely left here at one and a half o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. Then I stand corrected. He left here by the midday express.

Mr. RANDALL. How do you know that?

Mr. BLAINE. I will tell the gentleman how, when I get the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I ask gentlemen on the other side who had been yielded to over and over again for every interruption, and who yester-day refused absolutely to yield—I ask them not to appeal to-day to my generosity. There has not been reciprocity on that side in this

I wish to proceed with my statement, which is that this witness left about midday on Thursday, March 2, reached New York at six o'clock next morning, started for Canada from New York on Friday about noon, and reached Montreal on Saturday morning; and in Montreal, if he has read it to this day, he for the first time read the in-formation about the much-talked-of Cabinet meeting. Thus, on Friday, when the Cabinet meeting was held, and whatever was under consideration was considered, this witness was at that moment fleeing from New York to Canada; and the alleged publication in the Republican of this city was on Saturday morning, when this witness was in Canada, and the alleged publication of the same in the New York Sun, in the Burlington Hawkeye, in the Chicago papers, and in other papers all over the country had appeared after this witness had taken refuge in a foreign dominion.

Now, sir, does not this put an end to this miserable pretense about the President or the Cabinet designing to scare away the witness? the President or the Cabinet designing to scare away the witness? And does it not show that all the argument of yesterday based upon that pretense falls to the ground for want of any fact to rest upon? And is it not put on the ground on which we put it yesterday, that that committee—innocently, I have no doubt, I cannot believe any member of it wanted this witness to escape—allowed him to go without exercising their right even to say to him, "You will not get discharged, at least until we learn whether the House wants you for

Now, it may possibly also be urged to-day that the House has acted in such haste that they cannot prosecute the impeachment without further evidence; and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] admitted yesterday that there was not evidence enough in the whole case on which to base an indictment. I think, sir, the officer concerned is on that showing impeachable and ought to be presented for impeachment to the Senate. But while I admit that I affirm that this peachment to the Senate. But while I admit that I amrin that this House ought not to show an unbecoming haste for party purposes to arrive at certain results, and that it is a question for this House to consider whether they have not acknowledged themselves to-day to have been guilty of that unbecoming haste, both in respect to the witness and in the imperative order made upon the Judiciary Committee to report at once articles of impeachment, which has forced that committee into the position of obeying an order of the House four days afterward or five days afterward and still asking the House to excuse them from complying with its order and to give them further

That brings me to the question of this bill. The Judiciary Committee have brought the bill before the House. It has not, so far as mittee have brought the bill before the House. It has not, so far as I know, been printed. It is only before the House by having been read at the desk, and it is alleged—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to finish my sentence.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield a few moments more to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. And it is alleged that this bill on which the previous question has been forced, when we can only listen with our ears to find its contents—it is alleged that this bill is so drawn that the most guilts. its contents—it is alleged that this bill is so drawn that the most guilty criminal in a given case with friends on a committee may come be-fore that committee and answer certain questions under protest, his answers both revealing the crime and exempting him from all pun-ishment for it. Hence I have asked, as I did before, for delay, in order to be sure that we are right, and if we are sure that we are right, by considering amendments and otherwise, let us pass the bill that receives the approval of the sober judgment of the House. We do not desire to throw any embarrassment in the way of accomplishing the object, but let us see that in accomplishing one object we are not defeating the most important ends of justice.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE. I will not want as much as fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not want as much as fifteen minutes.
Mr. Speaker, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was anxious to learn how the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] could know that Marsh left here on a certain day. I told him I would answer him. After so much was made yesterday out of the alleged fact that Marsh was frightened out of Washington by some pretended threats of prosecution, I sent, after the adjournment of the House, to the Arlington Hotel and learned—and I have the memorandum here by the person who went—that Mr. Marsh left here on Thursday, March 2, at 1:30 p. m., by the express train for New York; and he was seventy-five miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylve miles on his route toward the miles of the miles of the five miles on his route toward Canada when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clymer] made his report at the Clerk's desk.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] has stated with precise accuracy that the next day he left New York for Canada, and that if he ever heard of these mythical instructions of the Cabinet he heard of them in the Montreal papers or in the New York papers of Saturday when they reached Montreal on Sunday; so that the statement of Marsh having been frightened by Cabinet threats is entirely without any foundation whatever.

I am authorized also to say that there never were any instructions whatever given in the Cabinet to prosecute Marsh. His case was never considered—never. It was simply a question to prosecute Belknap. Yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Lamar,] whom I regret to hear is ill and therefore cannot be in his seat, stated that if the question want to the grand jury it was not Belknap that whom I regret to hear is ill and therefore cannot be in his seat, stated that if the question went to the grand jury it was not Belknap that could be indicted but only Marsh, and he added to his speech a footnote after adjournment, to which the attention of the House has already been called by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] on a parliamentary point which I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk, in order that it may go on the records to the country as well as the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, based on what he himself has confessed to be an erroneous conception of the facts and the law.

The Clerk read the foot-note, as follows:

After I concluded my remarks, Mr. Sampson, of Iowa, came to my seat and called my attention to the statute of 1861, under which the testimony given by a witness in an investigation of this kind before a committee of the House is forbidden to be used in any criminal proceeding against him. Having, in the hurry of off-hand debate, overlooked that statute, I think I overstated the liability of Marsh to be indicted on the evidence before the committee exclusive of his own depositions.

L. Q. C. L.

Mr. BLAINE. I will put that on record.
Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will pardon me; I have not time. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] declines to be interrupted, and will proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. Therefore the statement is withdrawn that there was any special liability of Marsh or any special effort to get hold of Marsh. It was purely and solely a misconception of the imagination or the manufacture of some inventive mind. There is nothing in it whatever, and when gentlemen on the other side of the House in it whatever, and when gentlemen on the other side of the House charge that any one in this city behayed in such a manner as to frighten Marsh out of this country, they state, to put it mildly, what has no foundation in fact. I state again—and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] should think this is intended to be offensive, I beg to say that I do not so intend it—I state again that the simple failure to discharge Marsh would have retained him.

I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITHOPER I this morning took precisely that man of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] this morning took precisely that precaution in the case of the witness whose presence was so painful to the House; he simply retained the witness. So far as is known to the House that witness, as Marsh had done, had answered every solitary question put to him by the committee, but out of abundant caution the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs stated to the House that he begged that the witness be retained.

The mere fact of not discharging a witness retains him, and I do not believe there is a man in the United States who has nerve enough to leave this city when he is here under the orders of the House, under the control of a committee of the House, unless he is discharged by that committee.

Now the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clymer] must not understand me as making any reflection upon him. I do not desire to do it, but I say that the gentleman and his colleagues must accept the responsibility of a grave mistake; just to that extent and no more; of a very grave mistake. The witness Marsh would be in this city this day, and at this hour, but for that discharge. The House of Representatives were not permitted to consider the question of retaining him here, but we were forced, under the previous question, into ordering an impeachment; and at that time I say that this man Marsh was seventy-five miles away from this city, bound for Canada on an express train, so that it was absolutely beyond the power of the House to take any action in the premises whatever. was not only discharged from our custody, but was out of the city. He was gone; he had fled, and he was just as much bent, when he left here, on going to Canada, as any man who ever started from this city to go to Montreal.

A gentleman near me questions the propriety of this bill. have some very extreme provisions, but I do not care about that. I will vote for the bill, and I ask my republican friends to vote for it. I do not want the slightest possible ground of evasion or darkening or anything of the sort. I do not want it to be said that we made no attempt to get the witness Marsh, but I will venture to prophesy that you may pass all the bills of exemption you choose and you will not get him. I will venture that. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. How do you know?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know, but I am a Yankee by adoption and I can guess. [Laughter.] I can simply guess that he will not come, and he is now beyond our jurisdiction.

On yesterday we were told that the privileges of this House were invaded and its dignity insulted by reason of the fact that we were asked to send certain testimony to the grand jury of this District in order that a criminal proceeding might be initiated against the late Secretary of War. And it was said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Bright] and the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox,] who now so gracefully occupies the chair, [laughter]-it was Cox,] who now so gracefully occupies the chair, [laughter]—it was said by those gentlemen that it was done in order to interfere with impeachment. We were charged here with a great desire to get these papers away in order that impeachment might be lamed and hindered in some way. But forthwith, as soon as the House had voted that the dignity of the realm and the superior status of this House must be maintained, and that the impeachment must not possibly be interfered with, in comes the Committee on the Judiciary and tell us that we cannot impeach him at all. He cannot be indicted, for when we ask to have him indicted they say, "O, you want to interfere with his impeachment."

Very well; the House that was so grossly outraged said yesterday, "We cannot give up this testimony." Then the Committee on the Judiciary come in and say this testimony. Then the Committee on the Judiciary come in and say this testimony is not worth anything for impeachment. Here, then, we stand: The House will not permit the testimony to go before the grand jury in order that an indictment may be found against the late Secretary of War, and then our Committee or the Judiciary tell us that there is nothing in the testimony on which to impeach him. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] who spoke from this side of the House, where I hope a large deal of his sympathies belong, an able lawyer as he is, made a statement to the House, as I understood it, although I have not had the pleasure of reading it in the RECORD yet, that there was not sufficient ground at all in what was before the Committee on the Judiciary to impeach him.

Mr. LYNDE. The gentleman entirely mistook my remark.
Mr. BLAINE. What was it?
Mr. LYNDE. I made no such remark at all. I said there was testimony sufficient before the committee undoubtedly to bring the articles of impeachment upon; but I did not think that on that testimony alone we ought to proceed with the impeachment.
Mr. BLAINE. Why not, if you have enough ground?
Mr. LYNDE. Because it is without precedent.

Mr. BLAINE. Why? Mr. LYNDE. And be Mr. LYNDE. And because there is a great deal of testimony re-ferred to in the testimony of Mr. Marsh that we ought to have before the articles of impeachment are drawn, in order to render that testimony more certain and effectual.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understood the gentleman better than he understood himself. Now I understand the gentleman to maintain that there is sufficient ground upon which to impeach him, but you will hold the testimony under which you could impeach him until you can get something else on which to impeach him. It is not well to in dict him, because that will interfere with the dignity of the House.

Mr. LYNDE. He is already impeached. This is merely testimony that it is proper to frame the articles of impeachment upon.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. But I understand this testimony has already been recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with an enlarged power to search for something else on which to impeach him. The gentleman nods his head. Therefore this is not necessary to indict him. Mr. PAGE.

Mr. PAGE. To impeach him.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, to impeach him, I confess I am confused between the great dignity of this House, which was so insulted yesterday and afterward so magnificently vindicated, and the irresolute and halting course of the Committee on the Judiciary upon the subject of impeachment. It appears to me the Secretary will escape, will fall between the two stools; that he will not be indicted because it will injure the dignity of the House to have him indicted if we have to furnish the testimony, and that he will not be impeached because on the whole there is not enough upon which to found an impeachment, or, if it is enough, our committee thinks it well to hold on to it until we can get something else, until we can throw out a drag-net and catch something more. As my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] says, give the case to this side of the House and we will do both very quick; we will indict him and impeach him both. [Great applause.]
Mr. PAGE and others. Go on.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that I have anything more to say, and therefore I think I had better return the floor to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] expressing my great thanks to him, and I owe thanks to him wholly, and not to any one else, for the privilege of addressing the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. On Thursday last the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department reported that the late Secretary of War had been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. For this there were two punishments provided by law; impeachment and indictment. It was the duty of this House and of every member of it, and of every committee of the House, to do all in their power to secure both an impeachment and an indictment. If there has been any obstacle thrown in the way of it, which side of the House has been or is responsible for it? Certainly not the republicans, who are in the minority in the House. Sir, the republican members of this House on yesterday voted to send to the proper court of this District all the evidence within the control of this House, so far as it had any, which would aid in securing the indictment of the late Secretary of War; while the other side of the House voted against giving that evidence to the grand jury. The very contract between Evans and Marsh, which is the re-sult of the corruption of Belknap, is in the custody of this House, and yet the majority refuse to surrender it or permit it even to be used without surrendering it as a means of indicting the guilty Ex-Secre-

These are facts, then, which stand out in their naked deformity and cannot be controverted. Sir, it was the duty of the House to impeach the late Secretary of War. The House ordered articles to be prepared by the Judiciary Committee; and they were prepared. It is now alleged that in order to secure a conviction on articles of important the presence of the witness Marsh is necessary. Who, I peachment the presence of the witness Marsh is necessary. pray you, is responsible for his absence? Whom will the country hold responsible for the fact that he is not here? Sir, I do not for one moment entertain the slightest idea that the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department designed that Marsh should escape for the purpose of relieving the late Secretary Marsh should escape for the purpose of relieving the late Secretary of War from the impeachment or from the indictment. But the fact nevertheless remains that he did discharge this witness when he might have held him by authority of parliamentary law, and in all justice, and if he had not been discharged, he would have been here to-day to testify alike before the grand jury and before the high court of impeachment. It is said by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] who sits near by me that Marsh was discharged against republican protests. I do not know that fact myself; hence I cannot state it.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is alleged that the Cabinet of President Grant is in some way responsible for the escape of the witness Marsh. That has been sufficiently answered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine.] The allegation is unfounded in fact. The Cabinet had no session and could not have taken any action until this witness was on his way to Canada, fleeing from the country. So that any action of the Cabinet could not have influenced his escape or his purpose to escape. But that is not all. There is no evidence that the Cabinet ordered any prosecution against him; and if they had done so, if they had ordered his arrest, and if he had been in the city, does not everybody know that they would have secured his presence here, and that then, having detained him here by criminal process to answer to a criminal charge, this bill now reported by the Judiciary Committee would have relieved him from criminal prosecution and he could have been detained both to testify before the grand jury and before the high court of impeachment? So that, if the Attorney-General had ordered an arrest upon a criminal charge, it would have been a means of securing his attendance, and then Congress would have power to relieve him from criminal prosecution. The ends of justice would have been subserved if that step had been taken to arrest and hold Marsh here on any kind of process, no matter what it might have been. It would have been vastly better than to discharge him from process and relieve him from attend-

So far, then, as any responsibility rests upon the republican side of this House or upon any member of the Cabinet or the Executive himself, there is not the slightest evidence of a purpose on the part of any of them to shield the late Secretary of War either from impeachment or indictment. So far as the responsibility for the escape of Marsh rests upon anybody, I thank God that it does not fall upon this side of the House or upon any member of it. It is the business of the chairman of a committee, not the other members, to control the wit-

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have not time, or I would be glad to do so.

Mr. BUCKNER. I only wanted to know whether the other side of the House will join in a petition to the President asking that Marsh be pardoned. Mr. FORT.

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir. Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, the Judiciary Committee have reported two bills; one of them to relieve Marsh from punishment, in order to induce him to come back and testify. I shall vote for it, as I believe all the members on this side of the House will. But that is not all. Another bill is reported which makes it a crime for Marsh to stay away. So that we hold out every inducement for him to come back. We say to him, "If you come you shall not be punished; if you do not you shall be." I know the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will do me the justice to say that I contributed my influence, whatever it was, in favor of the first of these measures, and he knows, but I will not state, how much I contributed in favor of the second. I would to-day put upon its passage the second bill and pass it simultaneously with the first, so that we should say to Marsh in his retreat in Canada, "Come back and you shall not be punished; but if you remain absent you shall by your absence be guilty of crime, and for that you shall be punished."

Sir, every member of the Judiciary Committee, every member on this side of the House, has done everything that could be done to se-cure the punishment of the late Secretary of War for the crime which he has committed against the people of this country and against the dignity and character of our republican institutions. I regret exceedingly that this debate, not only to-day but on previous days, has taken a somewhat partisan character. If anybody has sought to make political capital out of it, the attempt at least did not first come from this side of the House. And I submit that in the attempt gentlemen on the other side have been unable to show any act committed or duty omitted either by the President, or any member of the Cabinet, or any officer of the Government, or on this side of the House, or by any republican member of Congress, which could bring any re proach or leave any stain or furnish any suspicion of a desire to shield the guilty Ex-Secretary from merited and speedy punishment. One and all, everywhere, by every means and in every direction, have shown by more than mere professions a determination to do all that could be done to secure the conviction and punishment, both by imcould be done to secure the conviction and punishment, both by impeachment and by indictment, of that man who has dishonored his place and his name and betrayed his high trust and brought some degree of dishonor upon our nation. He is not indeed one of "the greatest" or "the wisest," but he has proved himself to be "one of the meanest of mankind." His crime is by no means the greatest of the last twenty years. There have been others before which his paled into comparative insignificance. But these do not justify or mitigate his in the slightest degree.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now reported is substantially the law of 1857. It was originally enacted by a republican Congress. It continued in force until 1862, when it was found that improper advanting the state of the tage was sometimes taken of it; and there was substituted in lieu of it the following provision, which is now section 859 of the Revised Statutes:

No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used in evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. But an official paper or record produced by him is not within said

That act secured substantially all the benefits of the original law, and relieved it in many cases of some of the evils which it was feared might grow out of the original law. At all events the privilege given under that statute was one which was liable to be abused, and now, when an emergency has arisen which requires the re-enactment of that law in substance, though changed somewhat from its original provisions, this side of the House comes up and is ready to vote for it in order that the ends of justice may be attained. So that, so far as any legislation is concerned requisite to secure the ends of justice, gentlemen on the other side of the House have nothing to boast of over this side. The practice in England is to pass special bills to relieve witnesses from punishment in such cases as this. But we are ready to open wide the door to enable all committees to ascertain and expose all frauds. If the future shall render it unnecessary to continue the law, that time can legislate as the public interest may require. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope both these bills will pass. I believe, under the circumstances, both to be expedient. I know of no special objection to them. I think none has been urged by any gentleman here. Now let us all unite to do all we can on both sides of the House to show to the country in this centennial year of our Independence that we are resolved not only to continue our national existence as a Republic but resolved that the Republic shall have for its officers men of integrity, and if any of them are found guilty they shall not escape the punishment their crimes deserve.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. KNOTT. I was about to inquire, Mr. Speaker, what had be-come of the bill that the gentlemen on the other side of the House were so extremely anxious to discuss that it required at least two calls of the House before we could have the previous question seconded. I have heard no objections made to any of its provisions or to its immediate passage. On the contrary, if I understand gentlemen on the other side of the House, they express a determination to support it

Indeed, the measure seems to have been lost sight of entirely in an attempt to vindicate that side of the House against charges which have never been made against it, and to vindicate the Executive against charges I never made against him. Now, if my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] had comprehended what I said in my opening remarks, it would have perhaps rendered his speech entirely unnecessary. I did not say that the witness Marsh was hurried away from the city of Washington by the action of a Cabinet meeting, or by any threat made by the Executive, or any Cabinet officer, involving his personal safety. I said I would not undertake to inquire what it was threat made by the Exceptive, or any constraints that hastened his flight from the juri-diction of this Government. But I did call the attention of the House to the report made in the Government's home organ of the proceedings of a Cabinet meeting, in which it was stated very emphatically that there was to be no mercy shown either to Belknap or any one else who was implicated with him in these corrupt proceedings; and I did say that with this before Marsh in Canada, with this, like the sword of Damocles suspended over his head by a single hair, he would be a fool to return to Washington City or anywhere else within the jurisdiction of the United States. And he never will return until he has some assurance of immunity from punishment. I further stated that the President of the United States had it in his power, simply by the assurance that he should have that immunity, to bring him back here. And I said furthermore that his distinguished Attorney-General must certainly know that fact, or at least that I suspected he did. If there is that overweening anxiety on the part of the Administration to punish a high official who has brought disgrace upon it, the means are within its own grasp, who has brought disgrace upon it, the means are within its own grasp, and it has only to use them to accomplish that desired end.

My distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. Blaine] says, "Give this side of the House the control of the matter, and we will not only impeach, but we will indict Mr. Belknap." That side of the House had for five long years the right to inquire into this thing, to unearth this corruption, and bring this high criminal to justice, and have him punished as his crimes deserved. And why did they not do it in the five years which they had? [Applause.]

Now, I never impugn the integrity of that side of the House, and God forbid I ever should. I am not one of those who believe all the purity belongs to the party with which I am affiliated, and all corruption and dishonesty to my political opponents. By no manner of

means. I make no such imputation, and the defense coming at the time is inopportune and entirely uncalled for.

But the gentlemen on the other side, recurring to this Mr. Marsh, whom I have never said left here because he knew of the Cabinet meeting or that his flight was hastened by the action of a Cabinet meeting, have said that he left the city of New York some time the next day after the proceedings of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department had been reported to this House. I undertake to say that before the setting of the sun on that day there was not an intelligent negro boy of five years of age in the city of Washington who did not know precisely what had taken place. The whole city was in the most intense state of excitement about it. It was in everybody's mouth; and we fortunately have a telegraph from here to the city of New York, so that if Government officials here had desired to have Marsh arrested and brought back, the lightning-winged mes-senger could have transmitted their mandate to the police of New York before his arrival in that city and certainly before he left for

York before his arrival in that city and certainly before he left for Canada in the middle of the next day.

But again my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. Lawrence] reiterates the assertion that the responsibility for the flight of Mr. Marsh rests with this side of the House. I have asked the question repeatedly, and I appeal to the lawyers on this floor, and especially to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, to show me the law by which this House or that committee could have held Marsh here, he having given no indication of intended flight. Had you done this, you would have violated one of the most sacred of all the safeguards you would have violated one of the most sacred of all the safeguards of the bill of rights. You would have been guilty of false impris-onment; a lawless violation of personal liberty.

The gentleman from Maine seems, by some strange psychological power which he possesses of which I have no knowledge, to be able to speak for Marsh, and says grant him the fullest immunity and he will never come back again. He may be correct in that fact for aught I know; but I think I am very safe in saying that he never will come back again without a promise of immunity. But if the gentleman from Maine was so intimately acquainted with the thoughts of Mr. Marsh at that time, perhaps it was his duty to have informed the House that he was going away.

Mr. BLAINE. I never heard the man's name until the committee

mr. BLAINF. I never heard the man's name until the committee presented its report to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want him to yield to me.

Mr. KNOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I grant that my learned friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Law-RENCE,] has been as earnest in his endeavors to forward this impeachment as any member on that committee, and I am glad to say to the House that there has been in this matter, as there has been upon almost all matters before that committee, the utmost harmony and almost all matters before that committee, the utmost harmony and unanimity. We have all honestly worked to the same end. And that is, that justice may be done, and that the guilty may be punished; and in order to do that we have reported the bill which we ask that the House shall immediately pass; the purport of the bill simply being that if a witness shall be brought before either House of Congress, or a committee of either House, or before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and is required to testify to any given act or fact, and protests against giving his testimony, on the ground that it may criminate himself, and is thereupon compelled to give it, that he shall be forever free from any liability to answer criminally in any court of justice, and secure from any forfeiture or penalty of any kind on account of the fact or act to which he shall be so required to tes-tify. That is the whole of the bill.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have suggested that perhaps there might be a conspiracy between the accomplices of an accused party to come before a corrupt committee, and to testify before that committee, and in that way be acquitted of the offenses of which they may be guilty. That is within the range of possibility it is true, but no law was ever so wisely framed as to meet all possible cases that might arise under it. Just such cases are the quicksands of all legislation, and if we are to make no allowance at all for human honesty; if we are to suppose the House of Representatives is to be composed of scoundrels, and that Senators sitting as a court of impeachment ought rather to be clothed in the striped garb of the penitary than in the senatorial toga, that they would connive at or countenance a conspiracy of that kind, probably in that event the bill ought not to pass. But this bill will have simply this effect: whenever a witness is brought before a committee of the House or of the Senate, the House or the Senate is to judge whether they consider the facts in possession of the witness of sufficient importance to compel him to disclose them, and when in obedience to their compulsion he does disclose what he knows, then he has immunity as to those facts, and cannot be held to answer criminally for them; and if a future House or Senate, or a committee of either of them, shall make a mistake in its application, it will be their fault and not that of the law, if we shall pass it.

This bill, as has already been said, is substantially a re-enactment of the law of 1857—a law passed, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has stated, by a democratic Congress, and passed then just for the purpose for which we ask this bill to pass, in order that a witness whose testimony was sought might testify without endangering his liberty. And so important was that bill considered by that Congress that it passed both Hopes with the ongress that it passed both Houses with unprecedented promptness

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said all that the patience of this House will permit. I call for a vote. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman wish to have the yeas and nays on the engrossment and third reading?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill now

Mr. BLAINE. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 206, nays 8, not voting 75; as follows:

Mr. KNOTT. In connection with the resolution and the bill which has been passed I was instructed by the committee to report a bill in relation to witnesses. I now move that that bill be recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed, with leave for the committee to report it back at any time.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the permission of the House to have read from the Clerk's desk an article which appeared in one of the New York papers of to-day—the Herald—and which is published in the Star, a paper published in this city. I ask the Clerk to read the ar-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that there is too much confusion in the Hall. When personal questions come up it is better that members should retain their seats. It is utterly impossible for the stenographers to take down the remarks, as was sugpossible for the steingraph of the steingraph of gested this morning.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he prefers to go on to-night, or will he yield for an adjournment?

Mr. CLYMER. I prefer to go on to-night, for the explanation will be a very brief one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] will proceed.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the Clerk to read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Herald's Washington special has the following:

"Report here brings an ugly charge against the democratic members of the committee which developed Mr. Belknap's crime; one which both sides of the House will without doubt investigate at once. It is asserted that the following is susceptible of proof before a committee of the House: That when Mr. and Mrs. Marsh reached Washington last week, and before the former appeared before the committee, there was a conference at the Arlington between Mrs. Belknap and Mrs. Marsh, (several other persons being present, all being acquaintances and most of them knowing the facts which Mr. Clymer's committee was charged to inquire into,) that at that interview Mrs. Marsh, in talking of various transactions of which she knew, alluded to statements in circulation in certain circles in regard to the so-called Pendleton railroad claims relating to the Kentucky Central Railroad; that Mrs. Belknap said that the stories were gross exaggerations; that while it had been believed among some of her friends that she received $70,000 from that claim, she had in fact only received about half that amount; that the friends of Mrs. Marsh assert that if she is ever brought before that committee she will undoubtedly testify to the main facts given above.

"The republican members of the committee knew nothing of this branch of the subject until Saturday night, and on Monday morning Mr. Danford caused a subpena to be issued for Mrs. Marsh. But she having, it is supposed, had an intimation of what was to come, left for Canada.

"It is further asserted to be susceptible of proof before the House that Mrs. Bowers, now Mrs. Belknap, Hon. George H. Pendleton. Mr. Clymer, and Mr. and Mrs. Marsh made some parts of the tour of Europe together, and that on this journey some if not most of the party that Mr. Clymer had determined to bring Mr. Belknap down, he was reminded in pointed terms that if he was determined to do this, he must bring Pendleton d crats to push investigations. It is not meant to charge that any considerable number of democrats discourage investigation, but it is certain that some do.

"The record of Pendleton's settlement of the Kentucky Central Railroad claim, according to official papers, is this in brief: The road, after having been paid the usual military rates for service during the war, filed a claim for the difference between these rates and 90 per cent. of the usual rates to private persons. The amount of the claim so asserted was $148,553. Secretary Stanton referred it to Quartermaster-General Meigs, who twice reported strongly against it, and Mr. Stanton refused to pay it. In the fall of 1870 Mr. Pendleton wrote Mr. Belknap asking another consideration of the case. It was again referred to General Meigs, who was recalled and restated the former action, and twice again reported adversely. It was then referred to General McKee Dunm, Assistant Judge-Advocate General, who decided that Belknap had the right to re-open the case; that the claim was a good one, and that the Third Auditor should be asked to settle it. Mr. Belknap approved this in writing, and a requisition warrant was issued to Pendleton and payment was rushed through the War and Treasury Departments in one day, the whole face of the claim being paid to Pendleton June 12, 1871.

"Of course this matter will be brought at once before the House, but Mrs. Marsh's escape to Canada may embarrass the thorough investigation which will be required."

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, in a somewhat prolonged public service here and elsewhere, it is the first time that I have ever felt myself called upon to make a public statement with reference to anything that has appeared regarding me in the newspapers, for the simple reason, sir, that I believe this is the first time that I ever have seen my personal rectitude or honor directly impugned.

Now, sir, with reference to the article let me say that I never saw Mr. Marsh, the witness in this case, in my life until last Monday afternoon a week ago when he appeared in my committee-room. I never saw Mrs. Marsh but once in my life, and that was last Thursday morning, the day they left this city; when taking an early breakfast at the Arlington Hotel I saw Marsh, the witness, enter the room with a lady whom I presumed to be his wife. They seated themselves near me, and out of courtesy to a woman I went and was presented to her. The interview did not last three minutes and the case before my committee was never alluded to in the remotest degree. I have never met George H. Pendleton save on this side of the water; and therefore the charge in reference to my having traveled in Europe with either of these parties at any time is absolutely and totally false.

Again, it is alleged, or seems to be alleged, that I was cognizant of some meeting in the Arlington Hotel, in this city, between Mrs. Marsh, Mrs. Belknap, and others. If there was such a meeting, I certainly was not present. If matters were discussed there in reference to another crime, I could only and did only hear of it by rumor; and without any foundation in the world to go upon, save that it was said that there was a record—some one told me who was speaking about it—in the War Department; and fortunately I have a witness here whom last week I told to go to the War Department and search it up for me, so as to start that investigation amid all my other labors.

On Monday last, the Capital of the preceding day having contained the charge against Mr. Pendleton, I received a telegram from him inquiring whether he could be heard before our committee. I instructed a friend of his in this House to telegraph him that we would hear him to-morrow afternoon. With reference to my being unwilling to investigate this matter, my friend and colleague on the committee, Mr. Danford, of Ohio, will bear me witness that on Monday morning when I entered this Hall he came to me and said that he wanted Mrs. Marsh summoned, without telling me what for. He will also bear me witness that I instantly said "Yes;" and the Sergeant-at-Arms will prove that I went to him, took out a subpœna, and immediately sent a special messenger to New York for the purpose.

Now, sir, I brand the whole article, so far as it relates to myself, as utterly, entirely, and absolutely false. And the man or men who concocted that article have done so with malice aforethought and for some sinister purpose, of which I leave this House and the country to judge. I wish to say here that I will not be deterred from my duty as imposed upon me by this House to investigate frauds from the highest to the lowest, all through the body-politic, as they may come under my supervision, whenever I suspect or know corruption to exist. If it should strike the dearest friend on earth I would have the consolation of knowing that I had done my duty to this House and to the country, and they who expect to intimidate me by insinuations through the newspapers or elsewhere, or to deter me from my duty, have mistaken their man. I have as great respect as man can have for "the third estate." But, when it is used for a base and vile purpose, I will defend myself against it, and will appeal to honest men here and everywhere for my support and my justification.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. A word on the same line. I desire to say that I never heard of this matter until I saw it in the papers this evening. I knew we had issued a subpœna for Mrs. Marsh. I wish to say furthermore that these efforts of criminals and their sympathizers to deter investigation by turning the batteries of vituperation and slander upon our committee that is engaged in trying to do its duty to the country will fail of success so far as I am concerned. I propose to sail my craft boldly into this fight until I am blown out of the water, which I have no fears will ever occur. But possibly we may blow up a few more men of war that I know of before the struggle is over.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire, as a member of the commit-tee, to add that I never in the world heard, either officially or other-wise, of the charge that is here alluded to until two or three days ago, when Mr. CLYMER said in the committee-room that he proposed to issue a summons for Mrs. Marsh. What it was that she was to testify to, or expected to testify to, I have no idea. That was the first and that was the last and the only time that I ever heard anything of it until I saw this article to which my attention was called.

I am perfectly indifferent as to what the newspapers say. No man holds American journalism in higher appreciation than myself. But whenever one of that craft forgets his duty and becomes a barnacle upon his profession, a mere excrescence, who exists only to disgrace those with whom he is associated, I have ever held it to be my duty to refuse to stoop so low as to notice the miserable hireling. care though every newspaper in this country turns its batteries upon this committee. All we ask upon earth is this, and that we do ask and demand as an act of justice from the highest to the lowest in authority, keep your hands off the witnesses that we summon. And though this committee for the eleven years of its previous existence never made a report and never held a meeting, before this Congress shall adjourn we will unearth enough of the accumulated villainy of shall adjourn we will thearth enough of the accumulated vilially of the last fourteen years to sicken the country, by exposing the putrid carcass that has been so sedulously covered up.

Mr. MacDougall. We heard that yesterday. We have heard enough "putrid carcasses" here. Give us something fresh.

Mr. Blaine. One moment, before the gentleman from Kentucky
[Mr. Blackburn] sits down. I am very sure that he would not desire to state as a matter of fact what the facts would not sustain; and there is a point in his remarks of yesterday to which I wish to call his attention. Prior to the time when I thought I should occupy the floor, I sought to find the gentleman in his seat; but, not being able to find him, I did not refer to this matter, as I might otherwise have done, in my remarks. The gentleman stated in his speech of yester-

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will interrupt the gentleman simply to say that, though not in my seat, I was closer to him than if I had been in my seat.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not see the gentleman. Yesterday he made this statement in regard to the witness Marsh:

It would have been the exercise of an arbitrary power; we would have been guilty not only of assault, but we would have been guilty of bad faith, if we had sought to detain him longer. We came to this House while that witness was within the walls of this Capitol. We made our report, and stated the facts, as that report will show. The witness was then within the power of the House. He was subject to the order of Congress. We reported the facts while he was still lingering about your portals, and the House did not order his continuance in arrest, and no member of that committee ever asked it.

The gentleman, I think, will see, upon a review of the facts, that he was in error; that Mr. Marsh left the city at half past one o'clock, and the committee did not report until after four o'clock

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity of responding to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Maine, and I do it in this way: The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department left their committee-room about half past three o'clock, came to the House, and remained here waiting an opportunity to get the floor to make their report. Probably two hours before the committee left its room Mr. Marsh left without indicating any purpose of leaving the city of Washington that evening. I did not know, I did not believe, I do not know now, that Mr. Marsh left this city at half past one o'clock, unless it be upon the information of the gentleman from Maine, who seems to have been keeping com-pany with the witness or following close upon his tracks, and who has managed to ascertain the matter from hearsay testimony at the hands of the proprietor or the clerk of the Arlington Hotel.

I believed that Mr. Marsh was within the walls of this Capitol-I I believed that Mr. Marsh was within the walls of this Capitol—I had no right to believe anything else—when this committee came here to make its report. While sitting upon the floor awaiting the opportunity to make that report, I could not, of course, have my eye as a detective upon the person of Mr. Marsh. I had no idea when he left the city. I knew that about midday or after midday he was in this committee-room. I knew that at half past three o'clock this committee was in the House awaiting the yielding of the floor by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] who was then addressing the House, to make its report. I had every reason to believe that Mr. Marsh was not only in the city, but was within the portals of this Capitol at the not only in the city, but was within the portals of this Capitol at the time that report was made; and I am indebted, and doubtless the House is indebted, to the enterprise of the gentleman from Maine for having tracked him and found exactly when and where and how he started

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman is to be understood as correcting his statement of fact, that is very well. As for my "tracking" the witness, I have never seen him. I never heard of him till the report came in; since that time of course his name has been pretty familiar

But the fact of Mr. Marsh leaving at that time is a very essential fact in the history of this case. It was so essential that, after the newspapers throughout the United States had blazoned abroad the statement that he had been frightened off by an order from the executive department, I did take means to find when Mr. Marsh left the city. I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact, because I supposed, as I still suppose, that he had made the statement inadvertently, and would be glad to correct it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have expressed my obligation to the gentleman from Maine for calling my attention to the point.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not suppose the gentleman from Kentucky has the slightest ground for imputing to me a personal knowledge of that

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not desire to do anything of that sort. I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine for calling attention to this matter. I have stated to the House that the witness left our committee-room, and I had every reason to believe he was here at the time the report was presented.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Kentucky before he sits down

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquiry?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the gentleman the meaning of one sentence in the same speech, which I will read. Speaking of the committee not detaining the witness any longer, the gentleman said:

It would have been the exercise of an arbitrary power; we would have been guilty not only of assault, but we would have been guilty of bad faith, if we had sought to detain him longer.

Now, what faith had the committee or anybody else pledged to the witness that would have made it, in the judgment of the gentleman, bad faith" to have detained him?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am obliged to the gentleman for affording me the opportunity to explain that part of the text. I meant this, sir, that when a committee of this House, which is an integral portion of this House, issues its subpoenas and calls a witness before it, subjects him under oath to examination, then turns him over to the defendant, who is on trial, for cross-examination and that cross-examination has been concluded, and that testimony has been read over by the witness or to him and approved by him as in this case, then the functions of that committee with the witness have ceased. I now repeat, and will then explain, that neither that committee nor this repeat, and will then explain, that neither that committee nor this House was possessed of any power—and upon that as a proposition of law I defy contradiction—that neither that committee nor this House, neither the one nor the other, was possessed of any power to hold him any longer. If we had undertaken to hold him longer we would have been guilty of an assault; we would have been guilty of bad faith—of a violation of that public faith which as a committee of Congress we had the right to give, and did give when we subpo-naed the witness to come here and testify. After he had thus testi-fied fully to every question that had been submitted, then I say if we had held him longer in order that he might become a victim of that partisan prosecution which it was scattered over this city it was the purpose of your Executive to execute, we would have been guilty of the worst of bad faith, summoning a witness here to get his testimony to convict one of your high officials and betraying him over to the prosecution of your Executive.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman consider the House or the Committee on Naval Affairs were guilty of bad faith with the witness this morning?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not, because that witness was still in their possession and the examination was not concluded. Mr. HOAR rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to answer the question. That witness Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to answer the question. That witness was still in the hands of that committee, and the examination was not concluded. That witness was guilty of contempt of the House through its committee. The witness in this other case of ours was not guilty of any contempt. He had responded to every question which was asked by the committee of the House or by the counsel of the defendant. He had discharged his duties wholly. What I meant by the employment of the term "bad faith" was just this, and I repeat it: Had we held him longer, after we had no further use for him, merely that he might become the victim of the disreputable gag-process which has been introduced, we would have been notified extrinsion. which has been introduced, we would have been particeps criminis in his improper punishment.

Mr. HOAR. Then the committee meant he should escape?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows as well as any other man that he is asserting that which neither the facts, justice, nor common decency will warrant.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman misunderstands me when he utters that sentiment. The gentleman said it would have been bad faith, as he understands it, to have had this witness exposed to what he calls the gag-process of a criminal prosecution after that witness had got through. I ask the gentleman, and do not make any assertion whatever, and his sentence was, I think, a little hasty-I ask him whether we should understand that it was meant that the witness should

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer the gentleman from Massachusetts in this way: There is nothing in my statement that would have warranted the submission of such a question; but, waiving the propriety of the question, I will respond again and say this: The committee had no purpose of affording him an opportunity, or of aiding him, to escape, but that committee, or at least one member of it, for whom I have the right to speak, did not intend to become a party to that system of prosecution and persecution adopted or threatened by your Executive and his Cabinet, which in my judgment did not tend to promote the public interest, but was only designed and could only result in the detriment of that interest by affording immunity to thieves and shelter to criminals.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I have the floor, and will yield to any gentleman on that side who wants to ask a question.

Mr. DANFORD. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield to the gentleman, who is a member of the committee.

Mr.DANFORD. I desire, in view of the fact that I have been called as a witness by the chairman of the committee, to state my connection with this matter. I never heard this thing referred to in the newspaper until last Saturday evening, when a gentleman in whom I have great confidence came to me with the name of this witness, saying to me she would prove certain matters which he alleged against the War Department, and asking that she be subpænaed at once. I could not give it, as it was too late on Saturday evening; but on Monday morning I came to the House, found the chairman of the committee as soon as I could find him, gave him the name of that witness, and asked him that she be subpænaed to appear forthwith before the comasked him that she be subpensed to appear for this before the committee. The chairman's reply to me was that he would gladly and willingly do it; that he did not know the purpose for which I desired to have her, nor did I state it to the gentleman. He said he would bring the witness, let her testimony strike where it might, strike friend or strike foe—some such language as that. The name of the witness was given to the chairman, and he went at once in the direction of the effect of the Servern et Arms. This is the artire expection. of the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This is the entire connection I had with the matter.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Let me say a word, as so much has been said about the escape of Marsh and there has been such a the speak and the the cape of main and there has been such a tempest in a fea-pot on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to say that this debate only goes on by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. As a matter of personal privilege, I think I have some right to be heard for a moment.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I believe I have the floor. I yielded only to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Blackburn] to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MUTCHLER.]

Mr. MUTCHLER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I think the gentleman should yield to me for a moment, as this is a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. This House will bear me witness that I have carried myself in all these discussions with becoming modesty and reserve, and have not thrust myself on the attention of this House in any debate beyond what my position in relation to this matter entitles me to.

Much has been said about Marsh's going away, but I think the whole subject can be made plain in few words. The simple truth is whole subject can be made plain in few words. The simple truth is this: When Marsh came before our committee and gave in his reluctant but manifestly truthful statement; when he detailed to us frankly how he had been meditating flight from the country but, having been overruled in that, had now come before us to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and when we had heard him go on step by step until he had completed his startling disclosures and the War Department lay shivered to atoms in our presence; the simple truth is that in amazament at the great ruin and ence; the simple truth is that in amazement at the great ruin and scandal which his story had already wrought we for the time ceased to think about Marsh and what his further course might be; least of all did it occur to us then that he would, at that late stage of the case, care to go out of the jurisdiction. We never thought of such a thing, and for that simple reason alone we took no measures to provide against it. This is the plain truth, and a thimbleful of truth can overcome an ocean of nonsense and demagogism. I challenge any man in this House to rise now and say that at the crisis of this matter he thought about Marsh, where he would go, or what he would do! I hear no response.

EMPLOYMENT OF A COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to that resolution if it is only for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania offer the resolution for adoption at this time?

Mr. MUTCHLER. I offer the resolution and ask that it may be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

There was no objection; and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

TRIAL OF WHISKY FRAUDS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair having been requested by the Speaker to fill the vacancy in the Select Committee on the Whisky Cases, caused by the resignation of Mr. Harris, of Virginia, appoints Mr. Phelps, of Connecticut, to fill the vacancy.

JACOB BOGART.

On motion of Mr. REA, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the bill (H. R. No. 1727) for the relief of Jacob Bogart, now of New York.

C. H. HALE.

On motion of Mr. JACOBS, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdrawn from the files of the House papers in the case of C. H. Hale

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Bell for three days on account of important business; to Mr. Springer for one week, beginning on Monday last; and to Mr. LAMAR indefinitely on account of sickness

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON, (at six o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of the officers and members of the Harmony Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and a large number of citizens of Ohio, for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the evil effects of the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: Memorial of Charles N. Williams, postmaster at Elizabethtown, Essex County, New York, for relief, on account of postage-stamps stolen from the post-office at said place, to the Committee of Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pub-lie Lands A bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska; and A bill (H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

MRS. PHŒBE C. OAKLEY.

The bill (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phobe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan, was read twice by its

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senate will permit me I wish to move the present consideration of that bill without a reference, and after the statement I will make, I presume it will receive every vote of the Senate. The facts are simply these: This Mrs. Oakley was so unfor-tunate as to have a drunken husband and a large family. She was practically the head of the family and supported the family, and supported the husband also. Thinking that as she was practically the head of the family, she would be recognized as such under the homestead law, she entered a piece of public land, made improvements, and supported her family and her husband there. This entry took and supported her family and her husband there. This entry took place in 1872. In the mean time, during last fall or winter, some person who claims to be a man, but of which I have some slight doubt, made complaint to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that she is a trespasser upon the public lands. Under the law as it now stands, having a husband living, she cannot be treated as "the head of the family," and it was for this reason only that the Commissioner refused to allow the entry to be made. The officers of the land office at Bay City recommend strongly the passage of this bill. The Commissioner of the General Land Office also recommends it; and it is very desirable that it should pass immediately, as only about thirty days remain when she will be considered a trespasser and turned off the land and improvements. Such are the facts of the case. I ask that the bill be taken up and passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the homestead entry of Mrs. Phæbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan, No. 2713, embracing the east half of northwest quarter of section 18, in township No. 14 north, of range No. 3 east, in the State of Michigan, be declared to be as valid as though she was the head of the family within the meaning of the homestead laws; and upon the proofs of occupancy and improvement by herself and family in the time and manner required by law, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to cause a patent therefor to be issued to her.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented a memorial of the Detroit bar, in favor of an intermediate court of appeals as a part of the judicial system of the United States; which was referred to the Committee

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of 618 citizens of Outagamie County, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to complete the Fox River improvement and for the construction of a canal along the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the third plan recommended by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an increased appropriation for the extension of the signal service; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARVEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, asking Congress to make an appropriation to resurvey the line between the States of Missouri and Kansas from its intersection with the Missouri River south; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, relating to the rights of freedmen and others in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of certain citizens of Cherokee and Labette Counties, in the State of Kansas, praying for the immediate repeal of the resumption act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, relating to sections 16 and 36 on Indian reservations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, remonstrating against any discrimination in the present tariff rates on castor-beans, unless the manufactured articles of the East be placed upon the free list; which was referred to the Committee on

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of citizens of Fannin County, Texas, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Paris, Texas, by way of Cothrun's store, Myersville, and Elwood, to Bonham's, twice a week; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Alexander Smith, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of James Casey, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pen-

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of A. S. Evans and 122 other citizens of Fort Wayne, Indiana, and the petition of Harry Bates, jr., and 32 others, praying the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 568) authorizing the payment of prize-money to officers of the Farragut fleet for the destruction of enemy's vessels in April, 1862, have instructed me to report the same back, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as we find on examination that it is an appropriation bill simply. I move that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, reported it with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William H. Nessle, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of olorado, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 486) fixing the times and places for holding certain terms of the district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa, to report it with an amendment; and as it is a local matter, I ask that the bill may have present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to add at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided. That the United States shall not be at any expense, nor in any manner liable, for the use of a building or room for holding said courts at Burlington nor for fitting up the same.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to inquire from the Senator from Iowa whether there are public buildings at Burlington that can be used for this purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. There are none belonging to the United States, but there are county buildings there. The United States will be at no expense at all in fitting up a place for the courts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose the end of it will be that a set of public buildings at Burlington will be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will withdened to be a support of the present of the bill?

draw his objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to know from the committee if the subject has been considered as to the expense of public buildings at Burlington, and whether they will be upon the whole necessary. The courts may be needed to sit at Burlington; I know nothing about that matter; but I fear if courts are established at Burlington it will not be long before the Government will be called upon to erect buildings for the accommodation of the courts. If that is necessary, very well, and we may as well accept it now; but I think we ought to understand it ourselves in regard to that question. If the committee have considered it and are prepared to advise the establishment of courts at Burlington with the understanding that public buildings are to be erected hereafter for their accommodation, very well; but the idea that the town of Burlington will continue to maintain public the idea that the town of Burlington will continue to maintain public buildings for the use of the Government is contrary to all experience.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are no public building of the United States at Keokuk at present, and when the question shall be suggested of public buildings at Burlington, or any place else, my friend will find me opposing that measure, so far as this bill is to be a basis for such action, just as much as he. There is no thought of anything of the kind. It is a matter of local convenience to that portion of our State, and we propose it for this reason and for the purpose of settling a difficulty that there exists.

a difficulty that there exists.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachuetts insist on his objection f

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the bill had better go on the Calendar. Mr. WRIGHT. Then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the sport for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the report is withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EATON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 578) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 579) for the relief of Joseph Kinney, administrator of David Ballentine, of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 580) to create a port of delivery at Santa Monica, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed. He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 581) to establish a mail-route in California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 582) to establish a post-route in Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KERNAN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Gilbert M. Fitch be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That Messrs. D. G. & D. A. Sanford have leave to withdraw their memorial and all other papers accompanying Senate bill No. 735, first session Fortythird Congress, together with the report (No. 345) made thereon.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John W. Harvey on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following preamble and resolutions. and asked for their present consideration:

Mr. COCKRELL sibmitted the following preamble and resolutions, and asked for their present consideration:

Whereas by a general law of the State of California, upproved May 20, 1861, it is enhering in any portion of the Territories of the United States continuence this State being subscribers to the stock of any contemplated railroad, may be formed into a corporation for the purpose of constructing, owning, operating, and maintaining such railroad by complying with the following requirements; and whereas articles of association shall set forth.

articles of association, or to diverge from the route which they prescribe. It would be a singular anomaly if Congress should empower a slate corporation to do an act power to enact. The virthdrawl was, I am satisfied, not warranted by the act of July 37, 1866. I now return my decision of the 2d instant, and you will instruct the local officers to restore the lands withdrawn in 1870 to their former status, after the local officers to restore the lands withdrawn in 1870 to their former status, after density, on the 18th of December, 1889, issued an order to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, suspending for the time being his order of restoration, reciting that the order was issued in accordance with the suggestion of the chairman their present status, without change in any respect, until a joint resolution, in relation to the lands withdrawn for the benefit of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, then before Congress, should be acted upon; and California, was passed June 22, 1870, "that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is the control of California may construct its road and telegraph line as near as may be on the roate indicated by the map filed by said company in the Department of the Interior indicated by the map filed by said company in the Department of the Interior South of the California, was passed June 22, 1870, "that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California may construct its road and telegraph line as near as may be on the roate indicated by the map filed by said company in the Department of the Interior said railly on the manner and within the time provided by law, and notice thereof being given by the company to the Secretary of the Interior, he shall direct an examination of such ascide by commissioners appointed by the President as proved and the construction of such as a construction of the said and telegraph line has been constructed as required by law, it shall be the duty of said Secretary of the Interior to ease patents to be a constructed as a construct of the said

Mr. EDMUNDS. It strikes me at first view that that burden ought not to be imposed on the Judiciary Committee. At any rate, as the resolutions are long, I think they had better go over until to-morrow and be printed, so that we can see exactly what is proposed. Certainly I have no objection to the inquiry by some proper committee, but as the resolutions are quite long I would like to see them printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie on the table and be printed.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

Mr. INGALLS. If there is no further morning business, I move the present consideration of House bill No. 80.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll; subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after May 20, 1874.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment in lines 9 and 10 to strike out "May 20, 1874," and insert

"the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

tion of Senate bill No. 375.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Maria W. Sanders, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, upon the list of pensioners as the widow of Brevet Major John Sanders, at the rate of $50 per month, to commence from the 1st day of March, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood. The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amend-

The first amendment was in line 7 to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty" before "dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the words "per month" in line 7 to strike out "to commence from the 1st day of March, 1861."

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALENDAR OF UNOBJECTED BILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the remainder of the morning hour be devoted to the consideration of unobjected bills on the Calendar, commencing at the point reached at the last consideration of similar

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is their objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none. The Chief Clerk will report the first case on the Calendar following where it was last left off.

ELIZABETH A. NEIBLING.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was last stopped is the bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth A. Neibling, widow of James M. Neibling, late colonel of the Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER ST. BERNARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard, of Saint Clair County, Michigan. Mr. INGALLS and Mr. WITHERS. There is an adverse report in

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. An adverse report has been made in that case by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate. The bill had passed the House, however; and, with the permission of the Senate, I will read the report made by the House committee.

read the report made by the House committee.

Mr. Rusk, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report to accompany House bill No. 556.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander St. Bernard, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner was appointed a pilot on the steamer Michigan, United States Navy, during the month of October, 1844, and served as such until July 4, 1868, when he was mustered out. That the steamer Michigan during said time cruised on Lakes Eric, Saint Clair, Huron, Michigan, Superior, and the navigable waters connecting the same. That during said term of service, embracing some twenty-four years, the petitioner necessarily underwent many hardships, privations, and exposures to storms, &c., in the performance of his duty as pilot, which have finally culminated in a general impairment of his health, that renders him incapable of earning his livelihood by the ordinary avocations open to him. In view of his long and faithful service during the best part of his life, the loss of his health resulting therefrom, together with the satisfactory manner in which his duties were performed, as is shown by the accompanying testimonials and petition, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill directs the Scorntawa of the Latssier to alloce on the new testimonials and petition, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alexander St. Bernard, late pilot on steamer Michigan, United States Navy, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The objection, as I am informed, of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate is that this was not an enlisted man. I know nothing of the facts of the case, except as they appear by the report of the House committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I dislike very much to interrupt my friend from Michigan; but we are acting under a rule now that where a bill is objected to by a single objection it cannot be considered. Here is a bill that is reported against; consequently there are several objections to it; it is not now in order to consider adverse reports.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I had supposed—I was under a misapprehender.

sion-that we were now taking up those bills to which objection had been made or where adverse reports had been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; those cases to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio object?

No objection has been made yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. The report itself has always been considered an objection where it is adverse.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes

COLORADO PENITENTIARY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 386) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It approves the act entitled "An act for the relief of Jotham A. Draper," passed by the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, approved February 9,

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to have some explanation from the Senator from Nebraska as to what this is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The object of this bill is to correct a mistake made in the conveyance of title to ground on which the penitentiary made in the conveyance of title to ground on which the peniteritary of the United States in that Territory is located. By a mistake, first made by the owner of the ground, a piece of land was conveyed to the United States on which the penitentiary was not located. To correct that mistake, he afterward conveyed ten acres of ground, the ten acres on which the penitentiary was located. The Legislature of the Territory of Colorado, by act of that Legislature, ceded the title to the ten acres conveyed prior to that time to the United States through the Territory of Colorado, back to the original owner. This is merely the property of Colorado, back to the original owner. the Territory of Colorado, back to the original owner. This is merely to confirm the action of the Legislature of Colorado in that respect.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELMIRA E. CRAVATH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 40) granting a pension to Elmira E. Crarath; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elmira E. Crarath, widow of Isaac M. Crarath, late captain in the Tweffth Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment, which was to correct the spelling of the name, by striking out "r and inserting "v," so as to read "Cravath" instead of "Crarath." The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY TRUE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 504) granting a pension to Nancy True; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy True, dependent mother of Samuel F. True, late lieutenant and quartermaster in the Fourteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, to date from September 1, 1875.

of Illinois Volunteers, to date from September 1, 1875.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend that bill by striking out "September 1" and inserting "February 28;" by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "sixty-seven, deducting therefrom any sum which has been paid to said Nancy True as a pension."

The object of the amendment is to give the pensioner a pension for a period of time prior to that which has been fixed by the committee; and I will state in a very few words the reasons which induce me to offer the amendment, and I hope those reasons will address themselves to the conviction of every Senator in this body.

I know full well that the Committee on Pensions are obliged to adopt, and that they rightfully adopt certain rules as to the time when pensions shall commence, and they have fixed a period of time in this bill which corresponds with the rule of their action; but I insist the facts in this case are such as to justify, nay to demand of the sist the facts in this case are such as to justify, nay to demand of the Senate to vary that rule which the committee may have been compelled to adopt to be consistent in their action; and I am quite sure they have adopted that course for no other reason.

Nancy True was the mother of three sons who all gave their lives to their country, and she has to-day no surviving son and is dependent upon her daily toil for her own support. This bill gives her a pension, based upon the services of one of those sons who was a lieutenant, and it commences a year ago. She made application for this pension at the Pension Office and, as the papers in the case show, was only prevented from obtaining the pension then upon the services of her son because of her inability to get the surgical certificate that that son died in consequence of disease in the war, and the limitation of law within which that evidence was to be supplied expired and she did not get it. She then made another application for a pension upon the services of another son who was a private or a corporal, I think the report states, and upon that she obtained her pension. Subsequently, and upon that she comes here, she did obtain the evidence of the sur geon who had in charge the son that was an officer. He was out of the country, and that could not be obtained while the first application was pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, and upon that evidence she now comes here and the committee give her that increased pension between eight and seventeen dollars, I think, which she would have had at the time I name if she could have found that surgeon, as the report of the committee shows.

Now, sir, under the circumstances of this case, with a mother who addition to that what I myself individually know, gave her personal services for a long period of time as a nurse in the Army, without one mill of compensation, I say that it is a case which addresses itself to the Senate, and that she ought to have her pension commence at the time it would have commenced had she been able to obtain the

the time it would have commenced had she been able to obtain the evidence of that surgeon, deducting therefrom the pension she did receive for some four years of a smaller sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the committee report in favor of that?

Mr. HAMLIN. The committee report in favor of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is very ungracious, and very difficult, and very embarrassing to resist such appeals as those that are made by the Senator from Maine; and if this were an isolated or a detached or an independent case, I think there would be no doubt of the duty of the Senate to assent to the amendment that has been of the duty of the Senate to assent to the amendment that has been offered by him. But it is not a case that stands by itself. This morning, within a very few moments, the Senate have acted upon an amendment of the Committee on Pensions refusing arrears to the widow of General Dyer, who asked that the increase to which she believed she was entitled should go back to 1874. So far as I am concerned personally, and so far as the Committee on Pensions are concerned, I believe we agree that there is no reason in the nature of things why a pension, if it is to be granted at all, should not date from the period when the disability accrued or when the death of the person occurred for which the survivor claims the benefit of the law; but for reasons satisfactory to the Senate, for reasons satisfactory to Congress and to the Department, a different rule has been uniformly adopted; and to ask us now to depart from it while it is a matter of hardship and a matter of difficulty and of embarrassment, is simply to avoid the uniform custom and precedent of the Government in all its Departments upon this subject. I should be glad, so far as I am concerned, to have the pension of this widow, who, I doubt not, is deserving and whose circumstances are meritorious, date back to the period which the amendment of the Senator from Maine provides. But in my position as the chairman of that committee, charged with the administration of the laws in the cases which are referred to us for action, I feel called upon to say that this case does not differ in its merits, it does not differ in its peculiar circumstances from many that are continually appealing to us for our consideration and to induce us to depart from the provisions of the law. I therefore hope that if this amendment is to be adopted, it will be accom-is not to be regarded hereafter, but that we shall be permitted, in judging of these cases, to act upon our sympathy rather than upon the letter of the law by which we are controlled.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, one word only. The Senator cites another case this morning which has been committed to the committee for their consideration.

panied with some declaration on the part of the Senate that the law

Mr. INGALLS. Acted upon by the Senate.
Mr. HAMLIN. I submit this case to the Senate and to its consideration because it differs from all others; and it is in consequence of that precise difference that I ask the favorable action of the Senate. Whenever and wherever you can find the mother who has given three and all of her sons to the service of the country, and who was de-prived from obtaining a pension precisely as she will get it by this bill if my amendment is adopted, only in consequence of her inability to find the surgeon—whenever you will present that exceptional case, I say, it is the duty of the Senate to override a rule which I have admitted, as a general thing, was proper for the committee and which the committee must be guided by.

Now, I hope the Senate will allow this amendment to prevail, and that this woman will have that pension which she would have had but for the absence of that surgeon and her inability to find him.

Mr. INGALLS. I trust the Senator from Maine will not misunder-stand my position. Section 4709 of the Revised Statutes expressly provides:

All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension: Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

That is the law which we as a committee are called upon to adminster; and I say to the Senator from Maine that if we are to allow these appeals to our sympathy to prevail over the letter of the law which has been for wise reasons adopted, and grant arrears of pen-sions in cases where the application has not been completed within the period prescribed by the law, it opens a subject that will involve the Treasury in the expenditure of millions of dollars; and there is no good reason that exists in this case which does not exist in hundreds of others that are continually brought to our consideration.

I believe that the law is wrong, that it ought to be modified or amended so as to allow these parties to obtain pensions from the time when the disabilities accrued; but, so long as the law stands as it is, there is no safety for us as a committee nor for the Senate, except to adhere to it and to resist these appeals that are continually being made to our sympathies, which all of us would be very glad to listen to and to heed

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should not venture to participate in this discussion were it not for the circumstance that for several years I was connected with the Committee on Pensions, as my friend from Kansas is now. At that time there were thousands of cases in the Department pressed, about this principle of the last evidence, and hundreds and hundreds of cases before us in both ends of the Capitol, and after great consideration, endeavoring to treat everybody alike, so that the right to relief here or to a pension in the Department should be a right of equality, and not a right to be got by favor and pressure and personal knowledge, we settled down upon the law as the Sen-ator has read it. In both ends of the Capitol it was agreed finally on all hands that it was the duty of Congress to grant special pensions to follow the principle of the law applied to pensions in the Department, so that we should not be holding out inducements for people to come here when they could go to the Department, or have one rule of special grace here and another rule of law in the Department; that we must treat everybody alike; and that we would only act in special cases at all as a court of equity might do as it respects courts of law, by relieving against some mere technical defect or difficulty when the merit of the thing was brought within the spirit of the general law, and which, if the evidence had been sufficient and all correct, the Department itself could and would have acted upon. That was the principle. Everybody agreed that it was a right principle; and, it being a right principle, it appears to me we ought to stand to it.

I see the hardship of this particular case. I feel just as much sympathy, I think, for this case, although I do not know the person, as my friend from Maine does, because I have known (although I cannot recall the names now) of several cases in my own State where two, three, and even four sons, and in some cases the husband, too, all went to the war and lost their lives in the service of their country. They were cases of individual hardship; but the moment you take one of these, then everybody else thinks he has a case of similar hardship. He presses on your feelings; the distinction between the two cases is small; and that passes, and that is a precedent for the next. This lets down, as it always has, until by and by the business of claim agents to get arrearages of pensions in some form or other swells to enormous dimensions, and great frauds are practiced, not only on Congress, but on the Department. That is the objection to going back. That was the spirit on which this law rests, that, if after five years the case is not made out, the pension shall not take effect until the last satisfactory evidence is filed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether this case is not exceptional in this: that this woman does not seem to have been able to furnish the proof of the fact necessary to establish her claim within the limitation of five years? Assuming that the fact existed, she had not the opportunity or the means of procuring it within the five years. Does not that make this case exceptional !

Mr. EDMUVDS. It makes it exceptional to a case where the claimant did have the opportunity; but, if my friend will go to the Pension Office, as I have done hundreds of times, and explore it, he will find thousands, nay tens of thousands, of cases where an honest pensioner through inability to get his proof, which appears to have been honest, was not able to make it up until after the limitation. It was his misfortune; but the general good, and justice to other pensioners, and fortune; but the general good, and justice to other pensioners, and justice to the tax-payers, and fair play all around, obliges us to visit that misfortune upon him. We thought so; everybody thought so four or five years ago, on careful consideration when there were hundreds of cases before us just like this in principle. Now, with every disposition to feel just as my friends from Maine do, as a matter of principle it does not appear to me that we can agree to this amendment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORDON. I ask now that the resolution offered by me a few days ago be taken up, that I may offer an amendment and submit

The CHIEF CLERK. The following is the resolution submitted by Mr. GORDON on the 7th instant:

Resolved. That the Committee on Finance be instructed to ascertain, if possible, what amendments to our revenue laws are necessary to secure economy and certainty in the collection of internal revenue, and prevent the recurrence of official frauds in that branch of the public service.

The amendment now offered is to make the resolution read:

The amendment now offered is to make the resolution read:

Whereas the frequent enormous frauds committed by distillers and Government officials have deprived the Government of a large proportion of its legitimate revenue and brought disrepute upon an important branch of the public service; and whereas the interests of the people and the good name of the Government demand that Congress shall take immediate steps to so amend the laws as to secure economy and honesty in the collection of the internal revenue: Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to ascertain, if possible, what are the defects in the present system, and what legislation is necessary to remedy these defects; and especially to inquire—

First. Whether it be advisable to so amend the laws as to levy the whisky tax directly upon the capacity of the fermenting tubs and require it to be collected in advance; and,

Second. To create a corps of excise to hold office indefinitely, removable only for incapacity or malfeasance in office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, the resolutions which have been read propose a radical change in the revenue laws. It is proper, therefore, that I should briefly explain the reasons and the necessities, as I conceive them, for such a change. Let me, however, disclaim in advance any purpose to reflect upon the heads of the Revenue or the Treasury Department. My purpose is to deal with the system alone and with its administration, to show that it is not only defective, but that it is, and must continue to be, unless materially altered, a breeder of frauds.

The amendments which the resolution suggests are in the interest of honesty, of economy, of reform. Had they been adopted three years ago they would have compelled even Joyce to act like an honest man, the distillers to pay the tax, and would have made the "whisky ring" an impossibility; and, had they been incorporated as a part of our revenue laws some years previous to that, when the whisky tax was first imposed, they would have saved to the Government enough of fraudulently-withheld or stolen money to pay the cost of a hundred centennials or to build a Pacific railroad not only to California, but almost around the world, had there been land to sustain it.

These statements may seem extravagant or be startling, but I shall prove from official data that they are true. And, sir, if these statements approximate the truth, I ask in what department of Government is there a louder of more imperative demand upon us for immediate and wise and energetic legislation. Now, sir, to the proof. I believe Mr. Fessenden is universally esteemed as standing in the very front line of Secretaries of the Treasury. In his official report for 1864 he uses this language:

The annual yield of our distilleries has been about one hundred millions of gal-

He further says on the same page, 59:

Experience in other countries has proved that the rate of duty, unless far beyond the highest prescribed by our law, does not seriously affect consumption.

I wish to sustain Mr. Fessenden on these points by later official authority. Commissioner Pratt by his report for 1875 furnishes us the data by which we are able to ascertain that in the year 1870, notwithstanding the well-known and enormous frauds which have always been perpetrated under these laws, fully seventy-seven and a quarter millions of gallons of spirits were warehoused upon which the Government received the revenue. He also sustains Mr. Fessenden on the other point:

The amount of spirits actually consumed has not varied during these years, not-withstanding the changes in the law fixing the amount of tax.

The demand is as steady as the appetite to be fed is fixed and exacting.

If Mr. Fessenden was right in 1864, that the annual production of our distilleries was one hundred millions of gallons, and if both he and the Commissioner are correct in the statement that the rate of taxation does not materially change the amount of production, I think that I can prove beyond controversy that the statement with which I set out is not extravagant.

Mr. Fessenden's statement that our production was one hundred million gallons it must be remembered is now far short of the truth; for since that report not only has our population largely increased, but the entire Southern States have been added to the consumers and producers. But taking even this amount as the basis of calculation, it demonstrates a fraud of such Himalayan height and proportions as absolutely to have appalled me when I first fell upon its trail. What is it? If we have manufactured but the one hundred million gallons per annum from 1864 to the present time, we have had due to the Government the taxes upon one billion three hundred million the Government the taxes upon one billion three hundred million gallons in the thirteen years in which this tax has been imposed, the tax varying from twenty cents to $2 per gallon. By a simple calculation, for which any school-boy is competent, it will be seen that we should have received into the Treasury up to the termination of the last fiscal year $1,260,000,000. How much has been received? Let Commissioner Pratt state: "Four hundred and eighty-nine millions;" say in round numbers four hundred and ninety millions less the cost say, in round numbers, four hundred and ninety millions, less the cost of collection, or, net, about four hundred and fifty millions. Deduct this amount from the twelve hundred and sixty millions, and we have at once the colossal fraud of $800,000,000. But, appalling as this sum is, it becomes almost insignificant when we take into consideration the fact, which we must, that since then, as I have before said, not not only has our population increased, but the entire Southern States have been added to the producers and the consumers, and the additional fact, which all experience proves, that the consumption of spirits, like the aggregation of all other sins, multiplies with the increase of population. If we take, I say, these facts into consideration, we shall find that we have had perpetrated a fraud of more than one thousand millions of money; and I defy successful refutation of the statement. It has reached, perhaps, $1,200,000,000 of money. Where is it, sir? Has it gone into the pockets of the consumers? Not at all, for the price which the consumer has paid has varied but little whether the tax was twenty cents or $2 per gallon. Where is it? Gone. This gigantic sum of money, which was due to the Government, has gone into the pockets of dishonest distillers, or, what is infinitely worse, into the pockets of dishonest Government officials, sunk in individual and official corruption, in political and national demoralization and disgrace.

Now, Mr. President, it gives me no pleasure to bring these ugly facts before the Senate and the country. I have but one object, and that is, if possible, to arrest the attention of the country and of Congres that we may at once proceed to ascertain the defects which make such frauds under our revenue system possible and apply the remedy.

What are these defects? Let me point them out so plainly that they cannot be mistaken. In organizing our system we have plagiarized largely from Great Britain; we have incorporated into our system very many of her provisions, but I am bound to say that we have stelen the shadow and left the substance. We have set up the heady stolen the shadow and left the substance. We have set up the body of her system, but we have proceeded to knock the very breath out of it by refusing to incorporate her methods for securing honest men to administer it. Great Britain collects $250 gold per gallon on the production of her distillers without the shadow of suspicion even upon production of her distillers without the shadow of suspicion even upon her revenue officers. We cannot collect twenty cents in greenbacks, and when we attempted $2 in greenbacks, we lost it all, or at least about nine-tenths of it. Such is the official record.

Why is this? Why is it that under a similar system England can collect ten times as much in gold per gallon as we can in greenbacks? There is some reason for it, Mr. President. What is that reason? I wish, when I utter this truth, it could be heard all over this land; for it is a great truth. The reason is this: England appoints her officers solely to collect her taxes, while here they are appointed to collect the taxes, and to aid the party which happens for the time to have the taxes and to aid the party which happens for the time to have the appointing power. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order!
Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, is that true? Let me repeat: the efficiency of the English system depends upon the efficiency and the honesty of her revenue agents; while the inefficiency of our system depends upon the inefficiency and the dishonesty of our officials. What! Are Englishmen honest and Americans dishonest? Sir, I resent any such imputation. It is not true. But it is true that the officers of the English excise do not steal the English revenue; while, as we all know—the melancholy fact stands boldly out before us—the officers of the American excise do appropriate American revenue.

Let me repeat the question again. Why is this? It is, as I said before, because England has but one motive in selecting her officials, while we have a double one. So fully does Great Britain appreciate the necessity of removing her revenue officers from the temptations and corruptions of party that they are forbidden to belong to any political organization, and a vote by one of them for a member of Parliament would send him in disgrace from the service. Here not only may he belong to a party, but he must belong to a party and to the party from whom he holds his commission. Not only may he vote, but he must vote, and vote for the party and work for the party and way for the party, and if he refuse to yoth and work and way for the pay for the party; and, if he refuse to vote and work and pay for the party, his official head falls into the basket.

hold the very lowest position in her revenue service, he must be nominated by the treasury, examined by boards of officers, put out to tuition, and re-examined as to qualifications and character. This, I say, is required for the applicant for the lowest office before he can step upon the first round of the official ladder, with a salary almost contemptible in amount and with duties less important than those of an ordinary clerk. But what is the case here? A political partisan, without any experience, without any training, without any examination, often, alas, without any qualifications save the influence he can bring to the party, steps at once upon the topmost round of the ladder; is clothed with inquisitorial power; sent forth upon his mission for the party and trusted with untold millions of the people's money and the Government revenue. But not yet is Great Britain's revenue officer considered worthy the post of a collector. He must serve a satisfactory period before he is promoted to the second position. Not yet can he become even an examiner until he has served his government as long as Jacob waited for Rachel and equally as devotedly. Still England refuses to regard him as competent to the high duties of a collector. Three more years must he serve, and even then can only be promoted upon unchallenged merit and upon examination and re-examination as to his accounts, as to his capacity, as to the character he has borne throughout all his service, and the smallest stain upon his reputation is fatal to his preferment.

Such, sir, is England's method of securing honest and competent agents. Hence, Mr. President, her revenues are collected, her agents are proverbially honest, her politics are free from these revenue corruptions, and the reputation of the government from these official stains. But under our methods of selecting these officers, our agents are not proverbially honest, our politics are debauched by revenue officials, and the reputation of our Government stained by revenue frauds. I wish it were not necessary to this argument to draw this damaging contrast any further. Perhaps it is not; perhaps each for himself will draw it plainly and painfully enough. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to say that under England's system of selecting non-partisans and enforcing her laws her taxes are collected; that under our system of appointing partisans and not enforcing the laws our taxes are evaded; that under her system the taxes go into the coffers of the government; under ours they go largely into the pockets of the vampires of the Government. Under her system of selecting honest men, non-partisans, this revenue system is a success, the pride of her people, and the glory of that island. Under our system of selecting partisans to administer it, it is famous only from failure and conspicuous only from crime. It is the shame of the people and the disgrace of the country that so many of its officers have become embezzlers of the revenues.

Perhaps it may not be necessary to say these things; but it is necessary to my argument to repeat that as long as partisans are selected, by whatever party may be in power to collect the revenues, we shall have these officials who hold the commission of this Government corrupting our politics and bringing disrepute upon the service. You may multiply your restrictions and your penal enactments indefinitely; you may increase your Tice meters, and your hydrometers, and your saccharometers; you may double your diligence and quadruple your agents; but as long as it can be predicated of your system that your agents are appointed because of their political influence, so long will dishonest distillers bribe dishonest officials, and party exignates corrupt these party agents.

Mr. President, it will not do to say that Joyce and McDonald are in the penitentiary and that you will no longer appoint dishonest men to collect the revenue. My friend from Ohio said the other day that if specie payments were never resumed until the republicans appointed honest men to collect the whisky tax, resumption was postponed forever. I will not take issue with my friend on that point, for I am afraid it is true; but I wish to repeat my profound conviction, that whatever party shall be called upon to administer this Government, and shall proceed upon a like programme, to appoint men to office and to collect the taxes because of the influence they can bring to the party, we shall be forced to blush for these revenue crimes. Of course I believe that if it should be the will of the American people, as I think it will be, to call the democrats to power, they would bring honesty and economy to these departments. I think it would be almost impossible for any party to do worse; but convinced as I am of the fact that any change of parties would be beneficial, yet so fully persuaded am I of the power of these temptations to appoint party agents and the temptations to party agents to use the Government money to perpetuate the party in power and themselves in place, that I should feel very much like praying, "Lord, deliver the democrats also from temptation!"

I am aware that Commissioner Pratt has proposed certain amendments, I believe additional restrictions; but these will not do. This is only to prune the deadly Upas. You must lay the ax to the very root of the tree if you would stop the distillation of this poison in the revenue service. Sir, as I said before, the evil is deeper down. It consists in the mistake of which I have spoken of garbling the English system and refusing to adopt the English policy of selecting non-partisans for collectors of revenue.

Sir, we must remove these collectors of money from party temptation and party influences. We must create, if we would have a pure administration, a corps of excise exalted above the exigencies of party supremacy and removed from the temptations to party support. These revenue officers should hold their positions, like the officers of your Army and Navy, during life if need be, or during good behavior, placed upon moderate salaries, and removable by the head of the Treasury only for incapacity and disreputable conduct.

Why sir what sort of an Army would you have if every officer in

Why, sir, what sort of an Army would you have if every officer in it, from the commanding general down to the lowest corporal, were dependent for his position and promotion upon the amount of influence he could bring to the party; the number of votes he could give to the party; upon his subservience to the will of the party? That Army would speedily descend from its high position and become a profligate, an intriguing, a disorganized, dissolute political mob; and so long as the army of revenue officers shall be the slaves of party, these officers will drag down your service and the reputation of your Government into the slimy pools of political contests and of party corruptions.

Mr. President, where is the objection to this amendment? I can see nothing in it hostile to the genius of our institutions—certainly not more so than are the laws and regulations which govern our Army and Navy. Am I told that it will create a class specially favored by the Government? I come back to the objector with the reply that this is true of your Army and your Navy, and of the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws. Sir, if the safety of the country and the efficiency of the Army demand that it shall be removed from party influences, why is it that such an amendment to our revenue laws would not bring the like efficiency to that service also?

influences, why is it that such an amendment to our revenue laws would not bring the like efficiency to that service also?

If you will incorporate this amendment into your laws, it will create an esprit de corps which will make it as impossible for an officer of the American excise to bring disrepute upon his service by corruption as it is for an officer of the American Army to bring disgrace upon the flag by joining the enemy. I respectfully urge, therefore, upon Senators not only to pass this resolution, but to adopt this amendment. If, however, this cannot be done, if we cannot give up this party patronage, if the sacrifice is too great, although the privilege is so dearly bought, then I urge upon Senators the other amendment, namely, to provide for levying the tax directly upon the fermenting-tubs attached to the distilleries. This method would be simple, direct, inexpensive, effective. Let the tax be levied upon these fermenting-tubs in proportion to their capacity, in all the distilleries in the United States. The data are already at hand in the Revenue Department. Every tub, with its measured capacity, is now upon record. Let this tax be levied and if need be collected in advance as a license, and let that license be posted in a conspicuous place day and night, and let the law provide for the forfeiture of property for running after the expiration of the license.

There are three classes who will object to this amendment: First, those who honestly disbelieve that a method so simple would be practicable; secondly, the office-holders will object, because if this is adopted their occupation is gone; and, thirdly, the dishonest distillers, who know that such a law could not be evaded. The first class is the only one that merits consideration, and I proceed, therefore, to answer all the objections that can be urged by them.

ers, who know that such a law could not be evaded. The first class is the only one that merits consideration, and I proceed, therefore, to answer all the objections that can be urged by them.

First, it may be urged that Scotland tried once a similar plan and abandoned it. My reply is that Scotland did not try this. Scotland did levy a tax upon the capacity of stills, but the capacity of a still was found to be one of unknown quantities; it could be multiplied and was multiplied thirty-eight fold above the original capacity. The tubs, however, are simple wooden vessels, their capacity definitely ascertained by measurement, and now of record in the Revenue Department. When Congress, therefore, shall determine the amount of tax to be raised from this source, it will be a simple matter for the Secretary of the Treasury and the Revenue Department to apportion this tax among the distilleries over the United States, and, if necessary, collect it in advance.

But another objection has been urged, that if this method is so simple and effective England would have tried it. You might just as well ask why England had used for so long a time artillery drawn by Dutch horses and driven by Dutch drivers who abandoned it at the first approach of danger, while the French republicans were using the splendid artillery perfected by Gribeauval against them, or why the refused steam navigation when offered by Fulton or the great Napoleon threatened to put him in the lunatic asylum, or why she scouted the idea of rifled cannon until their superiority was demonstrated by Napoleon III at Solferino. Mr. President, the answer to the objection is that England is the most conservative country upon the earth, and never changes her methods unless the necessity is present and imperative. There is no necessity for England changing her methods, for under her system she collects her taxes and has honest agents. But with us there is a violent necessity for change, for we neither collect our taxes nor do we secure honesty in our revenue agents.

nor do we secure honesty in our revenue agents.

I said there was a violent necessity for this change with us. Why, sir, look at the result of 1865; absolutely nine-tenths of the revenue lost. And now in this year of our Lord 1875 the officials of the Revenue Department are not only guilty of frauds themselves, but are persuading, coaxing, forcing distillers into complicity with them.

Now, I think I have answered these objections, and I hope we shall adopt the resolution and let these proposed amendments have a fair consideration. If they did not compel, when adopted, all to be honest, they at least will make fraud most hazardous, detection most certain, and punishment most prompt.

I hope it is not necessary for me to disclaim any partisan purpose in this movement, for I believe, as I have already said, that the people of this country have determined upon a change of rulers, and party patronage would be as potent in the hands of the democrats as it has been in the hands of those who now administer the Government. No, sir, I hope I am moved by higher considerations, and I would respectfully urge the party now in power and the party which is to come into power to rise above party considerations in order that we may obtain honesty at least in the collection of our revenues.

If we will incorporate these amendments into our system they will include the party will into the collection of the content of the collection of the content of the collection of the co

If we will incorporate these amendments into our system they will simplify the whole machinery of this Department; they will rid it of its cumbrous and complicated machinery; they will make the receipts of the Government from these sources certain; and, above all, better than all, more important than all, they will compel honesty where the present system invites fraud, furnishes a refuge of party corruptionists and a hot-bed for all those vices which political intermeddling in the revenues of the Government has ever created under all governments.

If these amendments offer reasonable promise of this or any of these results, they certainly merit attention at our hands. The good name of the Government demands that some action be taken. No man can read the comments of the foreign press upon these revenue frauds without a blush of the deepest shame as an American citizen. Standing, sir, in the presence of that recent and awful event which throws a shadow over the whole land, and which all must regard as a great public calamity, I can but repeat what I have before said, and what I feel as keenly as I am capable of feeling any truth, that the very reputation of our American institutions, and the cause of freedom, throughout the earth is imminently imperiled by the sad of freedom, throughout the earth is imminently imperiled by the sad and sickening disclosures of the last few years. Corruption, official corruption in high places and in low, official embezzlement the daily record of the public gazettes, official integrity and official honesty in the estimation of the people almost banished from official station, Credit Mobilier, Sanborn contracts, Washington City government rings, and lastly the horrid, filthy, dirty whisky-ring, gathering in its net-work of temptation officers high in the Revenue Department.

I think it is Buckle who says that there are eras of crime and of different grades of crime. Whether Buckle says so or not it is true

I think it is Buckle who says that there are eras of crime and of different grades of crime. Whether Buckle says so or not, it is true. There are eras of crime, and this unfortunately is one of them. What will he who shall chronicle these events in the future call this era in our history? What can he call it but an era of public shame, of public theft, of public prostitution? It is time to begin a reform, and no better place to begin it than in this revenue service. The great evil, the towering, the overshadowing evil of this day is the love of money and the love of display which money permits, and the temptation of officials to obtain money through official corruption. This is the great fact that stands out holdly before us. How shall we exaggerate then. fact that stands out boldly before us. How shall we exaggerate, then, the importance of throwing around the collectors of our revenue all the conditions and before them all the incentives to honesty which shall enable them to resist temptations so peculiar to their situation?

Can we not do this? Can we not bury party considerations for such a result? Can we not forget for a time that we are parties with a great political contest before us, and remember only that we are Americans, with a republic to save, a reputation to redeem? If we cannot, if with this record of official crime before us, if with this demon of demoralization enthroned in the very seat of the Government, with this gathering flood of corruption rolling over great and once honored Departments of government, and breaking at last at the very steps of the Executive Mansion, if with the very foundations of political and of official morality crumbling beneath us we cannot forget the feuds of the past in the effort to save from the frauds of the present, then we shall surpass the madness of Jerusalem breaking into factions while Titus thundered at her gates.

Mr. President, this is a good year to begin reformation, and this a good place to originate it. Let us not only unite here without distinction of party to rescue this Revenue Department, but let us unite the people of all parties and of all sections in the effort to restore honest and pure government, and practical, substantial, universal re-

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish also to say a few words.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well, I will yield.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Georgia will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it is said that civil war is generally followed by a period of demoralization to a greater or less degree. I suppose there is something in that; and, in that case, the responsibility comes back to those who made the civil war. They are to be They are to be bility comes back to those who made the civil war. They are to be held responsible for its disasters directly as well as for its disasters indirectly; and those who made that war are perhaps the last persons who have a right to complain of its consequences. If the Senator from Georgia can suggest any method for the improvement of our revenue laws to prevent frauds and successfully collect the revenue, he will be entitled to the hearty thanks of the country, and mine shall be accorded to him. I will unite with him or anybody else in an effort of the third. There have heave support in the country of t the revenue; and I doubt not there will be hereafter, no difference what party may administer the Government. There are good and bad men in all parties; and when it is insisted that the bad men belong to one party, and that the good men generally belong to the other, I think an assumption of that kind may be repudiated, I will not say with contempt, but I may say very emphatically.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. GORDON. I cannot bear the idea of having the Senator's contempt, and, therefore, I must correct his assumption. It would be, indeed, more than I could stand. The Senator implies that I have said, or intimated, or insinuated that the bad men belong to one party, and the good men to the other. I distinctly said, and as loud as I could pronounce it, that any party which would administer the Government under this system unamended, would bring corruption in the collection of the revenue.

What the Senator did say he said very loudly, be-Mr. MORTON. What the Senator did say he said very loudly, beyond all dispute; but I think I can refer to what the Senator said. He said that there was going to be a change of parties in this Government; that the democratic party was about to come into power; from which we may infer that the Senator is the son of a prophet. And he said that the democratic party would bring, as he believed, integrity and competency to the administration of this Government, after having said in the strongest terms that the revenue officers of this Government were not appointed for the purpose of collecting the

Mr. GORDON. I did not say that, Mr. President. Mr. MORTON. * Alone. Mr. GORDON. Mr. President----

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President—
Mr. MORTON. The Senator must permit me to go on. The Senator said they were appointed to help the party and collect the revenue, and the effect was that they helped the party. He made the leading motive in the appointment of revenue officers of this Administration to be for the help of the party, to enrich the party, and to divert the revenues. He said that in substance when he spoke of the party. I repudiate that statement entirely.

The charge that the republican party is corrupt in its administration and that officers are appointed for corrupt purposes, a broad and general charge. Lideny as well as any assumption that the democratic general charge, I deny as well as any assumption that the democratic general charge, I deny as well as any assumption that the democratic party would be composed of men so much superior in virtue and intelligence that they would bring to the administration of the Government integrity and competency and thereby effect a revolution. There are good and bad men in the democratic party, and as I said before, in all parties; but when it is assumed that the democratic party is composed of honest men as a general thing and the republican party is not, I beg leave to say to the champions of democracy here and elsewhere we know the democratic party. We know them in every State, and we know them in every county; we know them in every country neighborhood. We have known them from their childhood, and knowing them as we do, we are wholly unable to say on our consciences that they are on an average one bit better than other people; and if we admit they are just as good on the average other people; and if we admit they are just as good on the average as other people, it is about as far as we can conscientiously go.

The Senator from Georgia starts out with a remarkable assumption. He has been examining figures, and he discovers that $1,200,000,000 of revenue arising from the whisky tax-alone have been stolen by corrupt officials. There has been a good deal stolen, I have no doubt, a great deal too much, for any would be too much, but I think tho Senator's figures are very extravagant indeed. Still, there are some statistics connected with the last democratic administration of this statistics connected with the last democratic administration of this Government that may give some color to what he said. The administration of this Government was substantially in the hands of the democratic party during the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868. I have here a statement of the tax on whisky during this period of substantial democratic administration as collected, leaving off the hundreds. For the fiscal year ending the 1st of July, 1866, the receipts were $33,268,000; for 1867, $33,542,000; and for 1868, $18,655,000, with a tax of $2 per gallon upon whisky. For the last three years of the administration, running the comparison through, with a tax of less than half that amount the most of the time, we find the receipts as follows. I will take the last five years. For the fiscal year ending as follows. I will take the last five years. For the fiscal year ending in 1870, $55,000,000; in 1871, $46,000,000; in 1872, $49,000,000; in 1873, $52,000,000; in 1874, $49,000,000; and in 1875, $52,000,000, on a tax of less than one-half what it was during the period of Johnson's administration, when, under democratic auspices, the amount collected ran down to $18,655,000. From these figures we may infer that, if the democratic party could get into power, it would bring integrity and competency to the administration!

The Senator has a sovereign panacea for all these ills. The first is that the revenue officers should be established as a superior class of men, and hold their offices for life. They should be put upon the same level with the Supreme Court of the United States and with the officers of the Army. They should not be partisans. He would follow the example of Great Britain, and not permit them to be party men at all. Does the Senator seriously propose that as a remedy? Does he believe for one moment that his party would ever be in favor of a proposition of that kind? Why does not his party in the House bring forward a bill to make these men life-officers? If it would be a good thing to establish life-officers in regard to the revenue collectors, it would be equally good in regard to nearly every other branch of this Government. The Senator has eulogized the government of England. It would appear from his remarks that he admires it very much more than he does a republican form of government. If this thing of taking tax-collectors out of all partisan influences and putting them in office for life would be a good thing in the General Governthe officers of the Army. They should not be partisans. He would them in office for life would be a good thing in the General Government, it would also be a good thing in States. Why has not the State of Georgia adopted that new idea? Perhaps, if that had occurred, there would not have been a default by the State treasurer of Georgia a few months ago of between three and four hundred thousand dollars; she would have saved that loss.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator state that as a fact?

Mr. MORTON. I have seen it stated in the papers, and I understand it to be the fact that there has been a default. I will not say what is the precise amount, but I think it is about $300,000.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator state as a fact that there has been a default?

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. GORDON. I do deny it. I deny it to this extent, that the question is now being adjudicated, and the treasurer himself claims question is now being adjudicated, and the treasurer himself claims upon his statements that every dollar is accounted for. It is now being adjudicated in the courts.

Mr. MORTON. Ah! He is a democratic official; he is dealt with very tenderly. If he had been a republican State treasurer he would have been impeached at once. The governor removed him from office, but he removed him very quietly. It makes a good deal of difference to which party a man belongs in some States, whether he is to be charged with criminal intent or with simply making a mistake.

The Senator's proposition, the result of his long*study and labor over this question, is that we shall change the whole revenue system and put these men in office for life, and then, the democratic party and put these men in office for life, and then, the democratic party being in power and being about to appoint a class of officers all through the United States to hold their offices for life, would they all be democrats thus appointed or would a part of them be republicans? These men to hold their offices for life would unquestionably all be good democrats, that is, true democrats to the party, however good they might be. Who does not understand the real character of this they might be. Who does not understand the real character of this proposition? Is there a democratic Senator on this floor besides my honorable friend from Georgia who will indorse it for one moment? Will not the whole country understand why this proposition is brought

Then my friend has got another thing which he seems to think is somewhat new in this country. I am told by my friend here on my left, [Mr. Sherman,] who has been paying attention to this subject for many years, that this question of a capacity tax on stills has been debated and considered for years from time to time and has been rejected always. My friend thinks it is a new idea in this country.

Mr. GORDON. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. It may be new to him.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator does not want to misrepresent me, I know. I did not make any such proposition as he suggests. I distinctly said that Scotland had tried the tax on stills and rejected it. I propose a tax, not upon stills at all, but upon the fixed, measured, registered capacity of the fermenting-tubs which is upon record in the Department.

Mr. MORTON. His proposition is-Whether it be advisable to so amend the laws to levy the whisky tax directly upon the capacity of the fermenting-tubs, and require it to be collected in advance.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator does not seem to understand. I am ashamed to acknowledge that I know more about the stills than he does. He does not seem to understand the difference between stills and tubs. He stated "stills" and now he reads "tubs." They are very different things.

The Senator says he understands more about stills Mr. MORTON.

than I do.

Mr. GORDON. I never was in one in my life, though.
Mr. MORTON. I believe that to be the fact because he says so.
I confess my education on that point is limited; but his proposition is that the whisky tax shall be paid in advance. How many distillers, how many manufacturers in this country, are there who could carry on the business under that rule? There are difficulties in collectcarry on the business under that rule? There are difficulties in collecting this whisky tax, and perhaps there always will be. There are some difficulties in the Southern States, owing to the murder of revenue officials from time to time down there, and violence that has been committed. Then it is said that they have family distilleries down there found among the hills and the little valleys where they manufacture simply enough for the neighborhood. I believe the Government has had a great deal of difficulty in suppressing illicit distilling in many of the Southern States. Would the remedy proposed by the Sepator help that? posed by the Senator help that?

posed by the Senator help that?

The civil-service reform proposed by the Senator from Georgia is very sweeping. Why does he not bring in a bill here for its adoption? Why not have some of his friends introduce it in that democratic House and pass it and bring it here for our consideration? If the life tenure of office is such a good thing, why not extend it to some other departments of the Government? In other words, why not come out at once in favor of a monarchy and against a republic? Because there the principle ends, there is where it lands.

There are some other forms of corruption as injurious to the public

There are some other forms of corruption as injurious to the public welfare as the whisky fraud; but I want to remark right here in regard to that. What the Senator knows in regard to whisky frauds he knows chiefly from investigations that have been put on foot by a republican administration, an administration that has not feared nor failed to investigate its own officials and to punish them when found guilty. If my friend can find anything like that in the history of a democratic administration in the past investigating itself fearlessly and inflexibly I should like him to point to the administration under which it occurred, and under whom. What he knows about the Sanborn fraud, if he calls it that way, was the result of an investigation set on foot by a republican House. So in regard to the Credit Mobilier and in reference to all these things.

There are bad men in all parties, but that party is an honest party which investigates its own officials, its own members, and punishes them when found out. Almost any party would investigate the opposite party. When a party investigates itself it is entitled to the credit of doing it upon high principles and to secure public justice; but when it only investigates the opposite party, it is liable to the charge of only doing it to make party capital.

As I said before, there are some other forms of corruption which are quite as dangerous to the public interest as the whisky frauds. Senator has referred to a recent terrible event which has cast a shadow over the land. I shall not now discuss that. I may have to pass upon that question in the capacity of a judge; but if common report is true, from which the Senator undoubtedly speaks, because he may have the same duties to perform, that appointment came as near being a non-partisan appointment as any we have had, and it will turn out to have had its democratic surroundings.

My friend went to Atlanta, Georgia, the other day and made a speech. I have a report of that speech here. The Senator replied somewhat to a statement I had made on the discussion of the Pinchsomewhat to a statement I had made on the discussion of the Princh-back question. He intimates that an understanding was had that silence should be maintained upon the part of our democratic friends during that discussion. It was thought to be a matter of policy to let the fight take place between republicans, while they of course should step in quietly at the last and carry off the prize. My friend refers to that in the following gingerly terms:

I know there are those who think that a reply should have been made to Mr-Mogrox in the Senate. But, my fellow-countrymen, he is an unworthy representative who, whatever be the clamor, however he may be misunderstood or misconstrued, will not hold his tongue when wagging it would bring disaster to his people! [Applause] This feeling has guided the Senate; and much as some of us have been misconstrued, we have still felt that the safety of the people was better than the applause of the populace. [Cheers.] The lightning-rod pointing to the storm-cloud and inviting the flash may be melted and consumed by the descending bolt, but it has served its purpose if it saves the temple! [Long applause.]

My friend and his colleagues on this floor have preserved silence, I have no doubt with great difficulty sometimes, but he broke the silence at Atlanta. Now I want to read another extract from what he said at Atlanta:

At Atlanta:

A few days before I left Washington, Senator Morrox, in the United States Senate, read from his seat a speech delivered from this stand by a distinguished son of Georgia, delivered, as Mr. Morrox said, by the invitation of the Legislature, in the presence of the Legislature, and with the approval of the Legislature, feries of no! no! no! no! from members in all parts of the house,] and it has gone to the North, flying upon the wings of the telegraph, that the champion of the convention in Georgia has at last informed the country and the world of the real purpose of Georgia democrats in calling a convention. What is that purpose? Mr. Morrox gave it in the classic words of this Georgian "to put the nigger where he will never be heard from again." Now, fellow-countrymen, this has gone forth to the North as the echo of the sentiments of this body. There is not a man in Georgia who does not know how unjust is such an imputation. Is there one in this body or this assemblage who does not feel the injustice?

Little further on he referred to this Georgian, who was Mr. Toombs. Little further on he referred to this Georgian, who was Mr. Toombs. I had read in the course of some remarks on the Pinchback case from Mr. Toombs's speech in Atlanta, made, I believe, in the hall of the house. The Senator from Georgia spoke to the same audience about three weeks afterward, standing, I presume, in the very spot that Mr. Toombs had stood. In referring to Mr. Toombs the Senator from Georgia used the following language:

I share with you, my countrymen, all of your pride in the past of that distinguished Georgian. For his past services to the State and country I honor him. But I would be an unfaithful sentinel on the watch-tower to which your confidence has assigned me if I did not warn you that that sentence, wild as it was, is brimful of poison for the northern mind and of defeat for democrats and calamity for you.

The "sentence" was the one above referred to, that Toombs should have said "let him form the constitution and he would put the nigger where he would never be heard of again:"

I say it is painful to utter these words; but I would be untrue to my convictions of duty were I to say less. I do not envy the ambition which seeks notoriety at the hazard of such dire consequences to this section and people.

The point in Mr. Toombs's speech to which the Senator from Georgia took exception, and which he answered, was that Mr. Toombs had gia took exception, and which he answered, was that Mr. Toombes and said: "If you have a convention. I can make you a constitution by which the people will rule and the nigger will never be heard of." Now I will read what I before read from Mr. Toombes's speech, and it will be found that that was not the part I commented upon at all, although it is the closing sentence of the extract that I read from Mr. Toombs's speech. I ask the Secretary to read, beginning with this blue mark and down to the close of the red mark on the next column, the extract which I before quoted from Mr. Toombs's speech.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

We got a good many honest fellows into first Legislature; but I will tell you how we got them there. I will tell you the truth. The newspapers won't tell it to you. We got them there by carrying the black vote by intimidation and bribery! [laughter,] and I helped to do it. [Applause.] I would have scorned the people if they had not done it. And I will buy them as long as they put beasts to go to the ballot-box! [Cheers.] No man should be given the elective franchise who has not the intelligence to use it properly. The rogue should not have it, for government is made to punish him; the fool should not have it, for government is made to take care of him! Now, these miserable wretches, the Yankees, have injected five millions of savages into the stomach of our body-politic, and the man who says he accepts negro suffrage, I say, accursed be he! [Cheers.] I will accept Grant and emphre before I will accept such a democrat! Applause.] The poor, ignorant negro—talk of him governing you and me! Ittakes the highest order of intellect to govern the people, and these poor wretches talk of governing us! Why, they can't perpetuate their own negro power. In the counties where they were in the majority they did not preserve their power and perpetuate their rule. My remedy helped us to break that up. We carried them with us by bribery and intimidation! I advised it and paid my money for it. [Applause.] You all know it, but won't say it. But I will say it, for I fear no man, and am prepared to render an account to none but the Great Judge, before Whom I must appear in a few years, for my enemies have thought my services to my country so great that they have done me the honor to exclude me from again serving my people. I contest that honor with our chief, Mr Davis. I am just as good as he is, and he is no better than I am. I demand that they shall place me beside him. I thank them for it! [Laughter.] It is very few things that I have to thank them for, but I do thank them for that. I am entitled to the honor they thus dispense, and I shall ask our Representatives to demand it for me, for I fought for it and to bring it about. I am, I believe, the only living secessionist to-day in the State of Georgia. [Laughter.]

I am, I believe, the only fiving secessionist to-day in the State of Georgia. [Laughter.]

This constitution is a thievish thing and robs the people. The largest county has the most representatives, no matter whether it is full of gophers or men! [Laughter.] "That's what's the matter with Hannah now!" [Renewed laughter.] Idon't want representation based on population alone; we never before had it so in Georgia. It was always based upon population and territory, and, if you have a convention, I can make you a constitution by which the people will rule and the nigger will never be heard of! [Cheers.]

Mr. MORTON. It is this concluding sentence of the extract I quoted upon which the Senator from Georgia commented. If he referred to the extract in any other part of his speech I cannot find it. I will ask the Senator if he did  $\dagger$

Mr. GORDON. Refer to what?
Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if he referred to the extract that has just been read in any other part of his speech except the one which I have just had read?

Mr. GORDON. I think not.

Mr. MORTON. The part of the speech of Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, that I commented upon was this: that he had said there, in the presence of the Legislature and of a large audience, that the election in ence of the Legislature and of a large audience, that the election in Georgia for members of the Legislature had been carried by intimidation and bribery, and he had contributed his own money and would do it again. He said, "You all know it;" and nobody denied it. He said, "The newspapers won't tell of it, but they all know it to be true." He did not speak of report, but he spoke of his own personal knowledge and of his own personal participation, that he had contributed of his own money to carry the election by bribery, and that it was awaied by intimidation and briterial transfer. that it was carried by intimidation and bribery. It was that part that I was carried by infimitation and bribery. It was that part that I commented on; and when my friend from Georgia went to Atlanta three weeks afterward, speaking to the same men and before the same audience, he ignores that part of the speech of Mr. Toombs, passes it by in silence, and spends his comment on a single sentence passes it by in silence, and spends his comment on a single sentence that I think I did not comment upon at all. It was proper for my friend there to have noticed that grave charge. One of the most distinguished men in Georgia had said to the world, "We carried the election by bribery, by intimidation; I confess it; I was a party to it." If the charge was true, it was a damning charge against the democracy of Georgia. If it was not true, it was a foul calumny, and then and there was the place to repel that calumny, in the capital of the State, in the presence of the very men before whom it had been uttered. The Senator from Georgia passed it by in silence.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, does the Senator know that the

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, does the Senator know that the Legislature took formal action the next day after that speech of mine was delivered to which he refers in reference to these very charges which General Toombs had made and from which the Senator has quoted? Does he know that that action was absolutely unanimous, with not one dissenting vote in the Legislature?

Mr. MORTON. I did not know that; but I was simply noticing the fact that my friend had passed it by in silence.

Mr. GORDON. I have sent for the resolutions; and I will ask that

Mr. MORTON. The Legislature may have thought it necessary to take some notice of that; but the report shows that the statements of Mr. Toombs were cheered to the very echo. The thing that I call the attention of the Senate and of the country to is that the Senator from Georgia, the representative of his party, referring to the very extract that I read, picked out a single extract of that extract, commented upon it, and passed by in silence this infamous charge made by Mr. Toombs. What must we understand? It was that the Senaby Mr. 10 mainteen the transfer of the control of t its consequences more far-reaching, one that was to overrule the will and the wishes of a half million of people in the State of Georgia. Now, while the Senator is proposing a remedy for whisky frauds— and I am very glad to have him turn the powers of his intellect in that direction—perhaps he could present some remedy for these election frauds, a remedy against bribery; and as he would appoint offi-cers for life to prevent whisky frauds, perhaps he would abolish all elections, so that there would be no occasion to buy men to vote the ticket, as Mr. Toombs said the democracy of Georgia did.

There are other parts of the Senator's speech that I might comment or; but I did not expect to say a word to-day until I found that the Senator was making grave charges in evidently a party speech, a speech for circulation In the course of his speech, however, he charged the republican party with tyranny. While my friend is the advocate here of conciliation, while he does not want to see "the bloody shirt," while he wants the hatchet buried, yet talking to his own people in the South he charges the republican party with being a body of tyrants and with having tyrannized over the South. As long as the southern people are educated in that way, so long may we expect a recurrence of what has happened. I say the republican party is not tyrannical. I say it has been the most magnanimous party in history; and my friend himself is a monument of the magnanimity of that party. His presence here this day is an evidence that the republican party is a magnanimous, a forgiving, and a liberal party. We have dealt more mildly than any nation with a rebellion that cost us so much treasure and so much blood, that made desolate so many homes in the North, and under the burden of which we are all struggling. We have dealt with it with a magnanimity the wisdom of which is to-day more doubtful that it was five years

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a short time and only to make some observations in regard to matters that have often been under my official action. I believe this is the first time since the present system of internal-revenue laws has been before the Senate of the United States when there has been made in regard to this system of taxation a party speech, made for party purposes. It is true my honorable friend from Georgia may disclaim that he made to-day a party speech for party purposes; but it is plain and obvious; at least it appears so to those who, sitting here, dispassionately heard it. Our revenue laws have been framed by men of both political parties. When the war came upon us we were compelled to resort to internal taxation, and we proceeded deliberately; and every tax bill that has been put upon your statute-book has been passed by the concurrent votes of men of all political opinions.

During the war the tax bills were adopted without any reference to party or party ties or party obligations; and some of the most eminent men who have sat here as democratic Senators have aided in passing those laws and aided in framing them; and I challenge my honorable friend from Georgia to point me out from 1862 to this day a single reference of a party character in framing or discussing our internalrevenue laws. So far as I know, he cannot do it. Every law upon the statute-book has been participated in by democrats in the Committee on Finance and by democrats in the Senate, and all these laws are but the result of the concurrent wisdom of men of all political

Let me say further to the Senator from Georgia that the Senate of the United States cannot originate these laws. His resolution ought not to be introduced here. It is unconstitutional to introduce it here; he has no right to introduce it here, except as a mere matter of inquiry. We have no power to frame an internal-revenue law; we have no power to change or alter these laws as they stand on the statute-book. Any law made must come to us from the House of Representatives, and therefore his resolution is inopportune, and if this resolu-tion were sent to the Committee on Finance the Constitution would tion were sent to the Committee on Finance the Constitution would compel us to disobey it. We have no right to consider it until the House of Representatives pass a bill on the subject.

If my honorable friend wants to institute revenue reforms, why does he not go to the body the majority of which belongs to the party for which he speaks? Why does he not go there and propose to them these two propositions, and ask them to send us a bill covering these points; and when they do we shall consider it. Now we have no right to do it; and if we do it, we do what he so much deprecates: we tread on the Constitution of the United States. The Committee on Finance. I may say, have over and over again laid Committee on Finance, I may say, have over and over again laid committee on Finance, I may say, have over and over again laid aside, as beyond their power or control, any reference to tax laws imposing, changing, or altering taxes, until the House of Representatives, by their action, give us jurisdiction.

But that is not all. The proposition submitted by the honorable Senator from Georgia is totally indefensible in any shape in which it can be presented. Let me take his resolution, (and every member of the Committee on Finance will bear witness with me that this subject has been discussed over and over again.) He talks about frauds, to which I will allude in a moment; and what is his remedy? That is what we want to get at. If a remedy can be proposed to prevent frauds, to make men honest, to enable us to collect all the taxes, who are more interested in bringing that about than we, the party in power, the party that receives the benefit of large revenues and that collects the taxes? If the honorable Senator from Georgia can show the Senate how we can prevent or defeat fraud he will be most gladly accepted as a worthy aid in a good cause. But look at the remedy he points out:

That the Committee on Finance be instructed to ascertain, if possible, what are the defects in the present system and what legislation is necessary to remedy these

That is our constant duty. But here are the specific points:

And especially to inquire, first, whether it be advisable to so amend the laws as to levy the whisky tax directly upon the capacity of the fermenting-tubs, and require it to be collected in advance.

The law as it now stands does require an inspection, a survey, and an estimate of the capacity of every distillery in the land, and the very thing he desires to have done is done by the law which has been upon your statute-book ever since 1868.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator does not pretend to say that the present law requires the tax to be levied on the capacity of the fermenting-tubs and collected in advance, does he?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. GORDON. That is my proposition, and the whole of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that is the proposition, and I will endeavous to show the Senator from Georgia that it is totally impracticable and totally absurd, and that we do provide by our legislation to ascertain as a test of fraud the capacity of every distillery, and that ascertainment is made by sworn officers and is liable to be inspected and reexamined. This estimate is fortified by drawings and measurements, so that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can tell you to-day the capacity of every distillery in the land. Why? It is to enable him to compare this capacity of the distillery with the result of the production of the distillery, in order to detect fraud. But the honorable Senator says that these distilleries should be taxed upon their capacity and that the money should be paid in advance. There is not a disand that the money should be paid in advance. There it illery in this land that could be conducted on that basis.

Mr. GORDON. Why, Mr. President, it is to me a very astonishing thing that Senators continually assert that I want to tax stills upon their capacity. It is not at all the proposition. The proposition is to tax the fermenting-tubs, which are actually ascertained by measurement and recorded now in the Revenue Department. It is the tubs that I insist shall be taxed, and not the capacity of stills.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say "stills." My friend is still worried by the speech of my honorable friend from Indiana. I said "distillby the speech of my honorable friend from indiana. I saw disenteries" as clearly as I could.

Mr. GORDON. And "distillery" includes everything?

Mr. SHERMAN. "Distillery" includes everything, and as a matter of course the tub or tubs are included. The whisky is made in them, and if you ascertain the capacity of the distillery you ascertain the capacity of the tub as well. What is the use of wasting words?

The law requires approach the producing capacity of the distillery The law requires expressly the producing capacity of the distillery for a day of twenty-four hours to be ascertained. That includes, as a matter of course, the measurement of every tub, its dimensions, its a matter of course, the measurement of every tub, its dimensions, its capacity, and number.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The whole includes every part.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. This is required by the law of 1868 in order to enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to see whether or not, when the distillery is running, it runs up to its capacity, and if the yield falls short of that estimate the deficiency is taxed as well as the yield now. If now a distillery, running in full force, should fall short of its capacity, unless some explanation is promptly made, it is taxed on its full capacity now.

But the honorable Senator says that the tax should be paid in advance. My honorable friend from Kentucky, who comes from a distilling country, knows that to require that would break up every distillery in the land.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me just there? The Senator does not pretend to say that I insist that it shall be paid yearly in advance. It could be paid by the day or by the week with perfect ease by every distillery in the United States, and I insist that you could get every dollar of the tax by it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose you take it by the month, what does the Senator suppose that the tax on a large distillery would be?
Mr. GORDON. Why not by the week?
Mr. SHERMAN. When you reduce it down to a week, or a day, you add nothing to the law as it is; because the law now requires the capacity by the day to be ascertained, and if the product falls short of that capacity for a day, the tax is levied every day. It is true we do not require the distiller to pay in advance, nor can we. The distiller may accumulate in his store-room without paying the tax for a year, which I believe now is allowed, and formerly a longer time. Why? He cannot market it day by day; and when a large distillery is running at its full capacity it may produce a million gallons in a very short time. If you require the owner of that distillery to pay the tax on that million of gallons before he can sell it, before he can put it in market, it would break him up. It would prevent anyman engaging in a distillery who was not worth millions of dollars. Take a distillery in Kentucky, where the product is worth nothing until it has been kept nearly a year on hand; to require the man to pay the tax on his production for a year before he can sell it in the market, would be entirely to prevent the distillation of spirits in Kentucky and Tennessee and every Southern State. The class of whiskies which are produced in Kentucky are only made valuable by time. Although in Ohio, and Indiana, and Illinois whisky some-times may run from the distillery and be sold promptly, yet still there they await the market, and sometimes an accumulation of six months must be made before they can sell the product at a profit. There is no man rich enough in this country to conduct such a business and to pay so large a tax until six months roll round, or until the whisky can be sold.

I am sure, if the Senator from Georgia had heard, as I have heard over and over again, all these difficulties and all these subjects discussed by practical, sensible men—and we never inquired whether they were democrats or republicans—he would see the wisdom of the present law.

For the purpose of ascertaining whether our laws are avoided or evaded, we do require the capacity to be measured and estimated; and if the production falls short of it, the distiller has to give some good reason, or else pay on his capacity; but to require him to pay that tax in advance is simply to destroy the business, and destroy the revenue; to forbid the manufacture of whisky, because there is nobody rich enough in this country to manufacture whisky and pay the tax on it in advance, and hold it until he can sell it in the market.

"I would say that this subject of a capacity tax is not only not new, but wherever it has been adopted it has been rejected, and it is not now in force anywhere in the world that I know of.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator say that this proposition ever as tried in any country! Mr. SHERMAN. No, si

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and it never will be.
Mr. GORDON. Never, if this party can prevent it, I am sure.
Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and if the democratic party were in power, Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and if the democratic party were in power, I ask the Senator from Kentucky if such a law as that could ever pass with his assent, or the assent of any man who knows anything about the business? Why, Mr. President, it is impossible. In England they do not require it; and their laws are oppressive to the last degree against the whisky-dealer; and it would not be right to require it. Would you tax a business before the business is performed; tax the whisky before it is created; tax the production before it is distilled? Who ever heard of such a thing? No, sir, our laws have been so framed as to secure to the Government the very largest revenue that can be obtained from this article. I think myself we have gone that can be obtained from this article. I think myself we have gone beyond the proper limit; I think we have made the tax too high; and I refused last year, against the votes of my political friends, to raise the tax. I knew and felt sure that I was right. Whether right or not, no one, so far as I know, has ever proposed to require this tax to be paid in advance, and thus destroy utterly the very business which yields us now fifty-odd millions of revenue.

The other remedy which my honorable friend proposes I am sure on reflection he would not agree to, because it is anti-democratic, it is anti-republican, and entirely inconsistent with the spirit and the whole policy of our system of government. It is to adopt Turkish usages, monarchical ideas, and monarchical plans to carry on a republican government. What is it?

To create a corps of excise, to hold office indefinitely, removable only for incapacity or malfeasance in office.

Do you think the people of the United States would allow an organized band of excise collectors, holding their office for life, and only to be removable by impeachment, or some grand proceeding of that kind? No, sir. These officers ought to be within the power of the head of the Revenue Bureau at every moment, so that the moment a fraud is suspected or detected he can be promptly removed, and not await the slow process of examination. A corps of excise in a republican government like ours! Why, sir, you would add to your Army and to your Navy and to your Supreme Court a corps of excise, to hold office during good behavior!

Sir, we have been perfecting these laws for years without the slightest wish to avoid the revenue, because what motive could we have? After having acted with every desire to get all the revenue that is possible, with every desire to frame the revenue laws, not so as to aid political parties, not so as to affect individuals, but so as to proaid political parties, not so as to affect individuals, but so as to produce our revenue, we are now met with two propositions like these, that will, as the Senator thinks, cure all the ills in life, and make us grand and glorious in all future time! He holds out to you that if you will only pass these propositions, which we have no right in the Senate to originate, we shall get a tax on 100,000,000 gallons of whisky yearly; and if we will only do what Great Britain does, we can put $2 a gallon, and so we could secure $200,000,000 if we will only be honest and do what he desires us to do! If he can find us honest men for officers in either political party, and point out a way in which honest men can always he detected from requests so that we can tall honest men can always be detected from rogues, so that we can tell the honest man from the rogue on sight, he will make the most happy invention that has ever been invented in our time or in any time. But that cannot be done. All I can say is, that his plan, as thus developed in his resolution, has already been considered fully in all its aspects, and I do not believe that he himself, after he has examined it in all its aspects, would vote for it.

Mr. President, the Senator has said something about the English system. That is not at all new to me. He first refers to a remark made by Mr. Fessenden in one of his reports, that we manufactured in this country about one hundred million gallons of whisky. That was the amount generally stated before the war. It had reached, I believe, at one time about ninety millions of gallons on a general estimate; but all I have to say is that that amount has never been manufactured in this country since the tax was imposed. Indeed, we know that what the Senator stated is not true; that is, that what Mr. Fessenden stated also was not correct, that the tax does not decrease the amount of whisky manufactured. It does to a certain extent. Take the whisky that was formerly used for burning fluid, for the manufacture of various articles of drugs, medicines, and the like; the consumption has tablen off layerly.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me just there, I simply want to state that what I said Mr. Fessenden said Commissioner Pratt says in his last report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already said that Mr. Fessenden said it, and that Mr. Fessenden was probably mistaken. At any rate, from the best information we can have, 100,000,000 gallons have never been made in any year in this country.

I think the reply of my honorable friend from Indiana about the best disposition to be made of this general statement. We knew very well that Andrew Johnson, with all the power in his hands, with officers scattered over the country, with a tax of $2 a gallon, only succeeded in collecting $18,000,000 from the whisky tax, or the tax on 9,000,000 gallons. Therefore, when the Senator charges us with $1,200,000,000 of lost revenue, I hope he will charge the administration of Johnson in 1868 with $182,000,000 of that loss; because, if the tax had been collected in that time, $2 tax on 100,000,000 gallons would have produced $200,000,000, and we only got $18,000,000.

Mr. GORDON. I ask the Senator how many of the collectors under Andrew Johnson who were appointed by Andrew Johnson were confirmed by this Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. We had such hard work to get an honest man in those times recommended to us that we did reject a great many; but the great body of them were appointed under Mr. Johnson's administration. I cannot now state the exact number when suddenly called on to answer; but I know well enough that from the time Andrew Johnson became President of the United States our revenue constantly went down, down, down, until in 1868 we were compelled to repeal the previous law and to pass the law of that year, which changed the tax from $2 a gallon to about seventy cents a gallon, and rom that time our revenue commenced going up, up, up, until it now reaches over $50,000,000 a year. That has been our experience.

But the Senator says, why not adopt the English plan? What is the English plan? I would ask the honorable Senator from Georgia if he can tell me what the English plan is now.

Mr. GORDON. The English plan, as I explained this morning in my remarks, and if the Senator had listened he would have heard—

Mr. GUEDMAN. I listened to reverse road and I think I heard it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I listened to every word, and I think I heard it.
Mr. GORDON. The English plan is very much similar to our own, except in the mode of selecting officers. In that respect the plans differ very widely, as I explained this morning. I beg the Senator, while I am on my feet, if he will give me his attention, that he will come to the point I made this morning and give us and give the country the reason why England can collect $2.50 in gold with her methods of selecting officers without one stain ever having rested on any of her revenue officers, while we cannot collect twenty cents in greenbacks and yet have our Government's reputation stained all

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely the question I was coming to, only I first wished to ascertain whether the honorable Senator from Georgia knew what the English plan was, and I ascertain that he Georgia knew what the English plan was, and I ascertain that he does not. It is true in regard to the appointment of officers in England a different practice prevails than with us. The Peers hold their office for life. That is no reason why we Senators should hold our office for life. In England no man is removed except for cause. That may be to a certain extent a wise provision, but the American people has not adopted it, nor has either party adopted it. The excise officers there stand like all others. They hold their office longer than ours do. They are better protected. That is not the reason why England can collect $2 and we only seventy cents. The reason is that in England the manufacture of spirits is a close and absolute monopoly. It is confined to six or seven houses. So absolutely extreme and harsh in its provisions is the English system that no commany can be harsh in its provisions is the English system that no company can be organized to manufacture whisky there except with a capital so over-whelming that it would be impossible in the United States to establish the business. If the law of England was here enforced this day, there is not a single Southern State, including Kentucky, where the manuis not a single Southern State, including Kentucky, where the manufacture of whisky could be carried on, nor could there be a half-dozen distilleries established in this whole country. They could only be established in New York or Boston, or Cincinnati or Saint Louis, or Chicago, where there are exceptional advantages.

Mr. GORDON. I respectfully submit to the Senator that that does not answer the objection I made, that officers under the American system are not proverbially honest. The fact that England has a close corporation certainly does not make her officers honest, nor the fact that we have no such corporation make ours dishonest.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give the Senator from Georgia more credit for capacity than he gives himself. I show that the question of the mode of appointing officers has nothing to do with it; that in England they make the manufacture of whisky so absolutely a monopoly that it is confined to seven great corporations, and then it is all done under government supervision and by the government practically. Would the American people submit to that? Are we prepared, in order to collect this whisky tax, to adopt the agencies which may be adopted under a monarchical form of government? Are we willing to see such restrictions and limitations wound around and about any trade or production that no one but the overwhelmingly rich can engage in the duction that no one but the overwhelmingly rich can engage in the business? Would the Senator destroy all the stills of Kentucky, and the great body of those in Ohio and Illinois, in order to carry out his ideas and adopt the English plan? No, sir; our people would not submit to it. Why is not that system available here? Because the chief articles which enter into the composition of whisky in England are imported. They come from this country and other countries, go into her distilleries, and are there manufactured; but here the articles that make whisky are produced on every farm from the farthest regions of the West to the East, from the North to the South. The regions of the West to the East, from the North to the South. corn, the rye, the wheat, and the other products which enter into the production of whisky are produced on scattered farms, and our laws are so framed that reasonable facilities are given to every State and are so framed that reasonable facilities are given to every State and to all parts of the country for setting up distilleries so as to consume their surplus products. Would you have us destroy all these in order to build up a monopoly of seven distilleries in this country so that we might collect $2 a gallon on whisky?

Such plans have been proposed. Such a proposition was once made from the city of New York, and it was answered promptly that it was not the duty of Congress in this country to make monopolies; that we ought to frame wise tax laws, of general convenience, that would give fair facilities to all sections. While we would adopt every restrictive provision that would tend to the collection of the revenue, we would not overthrow our whole system and the principles of our Government in order to collect any form of tax. That I believe was concurred in by men of all political parties.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have answered the Senator sufficiently. The honorable Senator has done another thing which I think his party and he will live to regret. He has taken advantage of a moment when the whole public mind is under a cloud of sorrow and shame, when every man feels sad at the developments which have been made, in order to excite in the minds of the people a suspicion that even greater wrongs have occurred, and that we have by our legislation devised a cunning scheme by which taxes may be evaded instead of collected. Let him point out a single provision of law that he would remedy; let him go to his fellow-members of the House of Representatives, and let them act upon his recommendation; let them send to us any provision whatever which will tend to enforce the law, and who will be so ready to adopt it as we? These laws have not been the frame-work of party; they have not been the frame-work of partisans; they have been the frame-work of men who have been engaged in an honest effort to collect the public revenue. From the time Mr. Chase first recommended the internal-revenue system of taxation to this hour, they have been the careful-study of business men in all parts of hour, they have been the careful-study of business men in all parts of this country. Their suggestions have been heeded in all cases. Days and weeks and months have been spent by the Committee on Finance in listening to the declarations and suggestions of men who came before us. We have adopted them where we thought they were right; we have rejected them where we thought they were wrong. We were not seeking to advance the interests of any party; and now we do not careful they can handlingly held up as country means a contract. not care to have our handiwork held up as a cunning means or agency by which taxes are evaded.

Ah! but frauds have been committed under these laws. have, and so they will under any law we can frame. Joyces and McDonalds and other people who will seek to evade the law, or pervert the powers of their offices to aid in defeating the revenue. We cannot help that. All we can do is to punish them when we find them out, and that we have done without mercy. And there—I say it now with all moderation and kindness—is the strik-ing difference between the republican and the democratic party. The republican party has never failed to punish those who have disappointed its expectations either by the dishonor of their office or by unworthy peculations or improper conduct; while, on the other hand, I regret to say it but history will bear me out, the democratic party have not been so diligent in punishing their delinquents.

The Senator says this is an era of crime. Have there not been other eras of crime and offense? What was the age of the Swartwouts? Who eras of crime and offense? What was the age of the Swartwouts? Who was in power then and how was Swartwout punished? What was the age of 1860 when every branch of this Government was in the power of the democratic party, when Floyd and Thompson stole money, bonds, guns, and ammunition, wrested them from the power of the Government for evil purposes; and who punished them? Who prosecuted them? Who arraigned them? Where are they now? No, Mr. President, it will not do for us here to cast stones at each other. Mr. President, it will not do for us here to cast stones at each other. All men who govern political parties or manage public affairs must sometimes be disappointed in those to whom they have intrusted power. We also suffer in that way; but so help us God, we will seek to punish as they deserve the men who have betrayed our confidence and the confidence of the public, and the confidence of our party. We will not shield them, whatever may be the result; and therefore, it the worst feeling. I have not the loss. sir, the worst feeling I have and the only feeling I had when the honorable Senator commenced his remarks and I saw the scope and bearing of them, was, not that the propositions he now submits could or ing of them, was, not that the propositions he now submits could or would be adopted even by his political adherents in this or the other House, but that his speech indicated a purpose, which he also avowed in his speech to his friends in Georgia, to come up here and charge all along the line the republicans with corruption to raise a great ado throughout the country in order to bring back into power the same democratic party which in 1860 not only robbed and plundered without question or trial, but led your country into the most memorable war of modern times, covered our land with dead, covered our country with blood, and made it necessary to impose the very taxes that we are now arraigned for devising. All men of all parties must look upon the evils and faults that arise in human government with some little degree of charity. Parties must be tried by their general results, not by their pretensions. If the democratic party is to be tried now by the pretensions it sets up to do what it proposes to do, it is sults, not by their pretensions. If the democratic party is to be tried now by the pretensions it sets up to do what it proposes to do, it is all well enough; but if this party comes into power, let me ask any one of them whether they will adopt this system by a corps of excise, whether they will allow republicans to come in and help administer the offices, whether they will be as liberal as the republicans have been. We know that the iron rule of the party will be adopted. I expect it; I look for it. If the democratic party should be restored to power, every man of my political faith will be turned out of office; and if I were one of them within their power, I would hasten out of the way before they would have an opportunity to turn me out. That is the rule and law of their party. Who denies it? Would they adopt a corps of excise for life in order to administer the offices connected with the internal-revenue service? No; "To the victors belong the spoils" say they always.

Now, sir, one of the evils under which we, the republicans, have fallen is that we have been too ready and too yielding in giving to our adversaries political power. Some of the worst troubles in which we have been involved have been by not regarding a man's public life, but rather his accidental pretensions for the time being, and trusting him with high political power. No, sir, the Senator ought not to seize on the passing events of the hour for any other purpose than to join us in meting out to the men who have been guilty of offeness the due numishment invested by the law.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, when I introduced this resolution I had no conception of the wide range which was to be taken in this debate. It was not my purpose to make a party movement. I distinctly disclaimed it. I have no right to speak for any one on this subject but myself, and after having stated, as I did, distinctly that whateverparty might come into power the system ought to be changed, and that it was a dangerous system even in the hands of democrats, I am astonished to find that Senators object to it as a partisan effort. Because forsooth I have thought it my duty to bring to the attention of the country the facts which are proven by the records of the Department, I am assailing the republican party! Why, sir, has it come to this, that to expose crime is to assail the republican party? Has it come to this, that whenever a southern Senator makes reference to crime perpetrated against the Government he is to be insulted with the reminder that he sits here by the elemency of the republican party, and must, therefore, refrain from all reference to their delinquencies? I have not, sir, so understood my duty as a Senator. I repeat, my purpose was not partisan. There is not a Senator on this side of the Chamber with whom I have consulted in reference to this measure. The Senator from Ohio therefore makes an insinuation unworthy of him when he charges that my object is to serve my own party, and that I would seek to take advantage of the peculiar and sad circumstances around us. Sir, this resolution has been prepared for more than a month, and the remarks which I have had in mind to submit have been postponed because of the pressing business before the Senate. No, sir; I seek to take no advantage of the gloom that overhangs this country. Rather would I, if I could, gather from some source one ray of light to lead us out of this night of fraud and of official demoralization.

The Senator from Ohio says the proposition is anti-republican and anti-democratic. What is it? Is is simply to enforce a civil-service law in this Revenue Department and forbid that the collectors of the revenue shall depend upon party supremacy for their continuance

This is the whole of it; and all of this high-sounding bombast about anti-republicanism is only intended to divert the attention of the people from the colossal frauds which have been perpetrated in this Department of the Government.

The Senator from Ohio asks, what else do we want, except to keep these officers of excise under the control of the Department of Internal Revenue? That is precisely the proposition I make, Mr. President, that this shall be a corps of excise, removable by the head of that Department, but not removable for political cause or for party purposes; removable only for incompetency or malfeasance in office. This, as I understand it, was the declared purpose of all the civil-service laws that have been passed by Congress.

The Senator from Indiana has referred to my speech delivered in Atlanta. I confess that I am unable to see how a speech delivered before the Legislature of Georgia, in which I sought to acquaint them with the great injustice which that Senator had done them on this floor, has any conceivable connection with or bearing upon the question now before the Senate. And I must repeat that I am amazed at the effort of Senators to divert the course of this debate from its legitimate channel. Sir, is the fact that I have differed with these Senators in the past; that, in accordance with the political teachings received from my youth up and in obedience to my conscience, I was led to differ with them in the late war—is that fact forever to preclude me from criticising upon this floor the conduct of the Administration or the frauds which my judgment tells can and ought to be prevented? The Senator from Indiana regards this difference as such a crime that I am to be debarred from all right to complain of other The honorable Senator knows that our unfortunate war arose from differences of opinion which were honestly entertained by the different sections of this country as to the character of the Union under the Constitution; and he will fail of his purpose to draw me into any passionate discussion of those war issues. The war was into any passionate discussion of those war issues. The war was fought upon issues which have been buried never to be resurrected. And it is most unfortunate for the peace of the country and for wise legislation that these war passions are to be appealed to upon all occasions when complaint is instituted against official corruptions. Both the South and the North had their convictions and placed their constructions upon the Constitution, which each sought to make good in battle. But when the South, acting upon her construction of the Constitution, sought to secode from the Union she placed that issue upon the arbitrament of hattle and when the issue was decided upon the arbitrament of battle, and when the issue was decided against her she surrendered her hitherto-claimed right to withdraw as a peaceful remedy. The Senator ought to know, the Senator does know, that henceforth and forever this question is settled at the South and in the mind of every man at the South, and has no place in this discussion, and is only intruded for an evident political purpose.

Mr. EATON. That is their stock in trade.

Mr. GORDON. However, as my honorable friend suggests, if the privilege of thrusting these issues into all discussions were taken from the Senator we should deprive him of his stock in trade. It is to me, sir, a melancholy reflection, that, however sincere a southern representative may be, however single his purpose to serve the best interests of his country, no argument is so potent with the Senator from Indiana when it suits his purpose as a reference to the great crime of rebellion.

The Senator refers to the Georgian from whose speech he quoted and concludes that the speech in question reflected the sentiments of the people because it was applauded. Why, sir, the Senator himself would be applauded by some, I presume, were he to address a promiscuous crowd in Georgia or anywhere else in the country. But he says the speech in question was cheered to the echo. The Senator, I presume, draws upon his imagination for that statement, for I have presume, draws upon his imagination for that statement, for I have seen no such report.

Again, sir. The Senator stopped his quotation from my own speech at Atlanta at the point where I put the question to the General Assembly of Georgia whether there was a man upon that floor who did not feel the injustice which the Senator had done that body by quoting the language of that Georgian as reflecting their sentiments. He failed to read to the Senate that the answer was a universal "no" from one end of that hall to the other. I ask now, in vindication of the Georgia Legislature and of the people of Georgia and of tion of the Georgia Legislature and of the people of Georgia and of myself, that the formal resolutions adopted by that body the following day be read. I ask the Secretary to read them, and I wish to remark in advance that they were passed without one dissenting voice. Yet the Senator from Indiana would hold the people of Georgia and of the South responsible for the wild utterances of one man who claims no responsibility save to himself. Is it generous, is it just—I will not inquire whether it be pertinent to the question at issue—is it not ungenerous, unjust, and unpatriotic to evade the real issue before the Senate in the endeavor to awaken prejudice upon so flimsy a plea against the people of one of the States of this Union and in the face of their solemn declarations contained in these resolutions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

Action of the Legislature of Georgia upon the rights of the colored race. Atlanta, Georgia, February 15.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What year?
Mr. GORDON. They were passed the next day after my speech to which the Senator from Indiana has referred.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions as follows:

The following resolution was to-day introduced by Mr. Bacon, of Bibb, and unanimously agreed to by the house of representatives:

"Whereas it has been charged on the floor of the United States Senate and by a portion of the public press of the Northern States that it is the design of the Legislature of Georgia to abrogate or abridge the privileges or rights now enjoyed equally by all citizens of the State under the Constitution of the United States:

Therefore,

Therefore,

"Be it resolved, (as the sense of this General Assembly.) That equal political rights of all citizens of this State, regardless of race or previous condition, are permanently fixed and secured by the Constitution of the United States, which is recognized by this body as the supreme law of this land, and that no abridgement of or interference with these rights is proposed or contemplated or desired in any action of the General Assembly, or by the people whom we represent, and that any and all legislation in contravention thereof, either by the Legislature or by a convention of the people, would be null and void.

"Resolved further, That the political relations of all classes in this State have been harmoniously adjusted upon the basis of the present provisions of the Constitution of the United States, that peace and good feeling between races prevail throughout the State, and that it is neither the desire nor to the interest of the people of this State to re-open those questions, which have been thus permanently settled beyond the power of agitation to disturb."

Mr. GORDON Legiova Layer for the properties of the property of the power of agitation to disturb."

Mr. GORDON. I believe I have finished all I had to say. My friend from Maryland [Mr. Dennis] reminds me that reference was made to the different systems of manufacture of spirits in England and the Suffice it to say on that point that the frauds are committed, not in the manufacture, but after the spirits come from the still and are in the hands of Government officers.

still and are in the hands of Government officers.

Mr. MORTON. I confess my surprise on the reading of the resolutions passed by the Legislature of Georgia. The point that I made in my speech was that Mr. Toombs had charged that the election in Georgia had been carried by bribery and intimidation, declaring himself a party to it, that he had helped to furnish the money, and that while my friend from Georgia [Senator Gordon] had criticised one statement of Mr. Toombs, he had passed that by in silence. My friend said that the Legislature of Georgia had attended to that matter on the next day. Now the resolutions have been read, and they have been as silent in regard to the bribery or intimidation as my friend was.

Mr. GORDON. I have no doubt that General Toombs told the truth when he said that he had given money to an election. I have no doubt that my friend from Indiana would tell the truth if he would admit here that there never had been an election in Indiana would admit here that there never had been an election in Indiana for many years to which he did not give money.

Mr. MORTON. Ah! Mr. President, that will not do. Mr. Toombs did not say that he had given money—as men can do legitimately—to carry on an election, but he said he had given money to buy votes. I never did that. He said he did that, "and," says he, "you know it, all of you; that is the way we carried it." The Senator cannot denviit.

Mr. GORDON. I do deny that the election was carried in that way in Georgia at all. I assert here to-dayroundly, and in the hearing of the Senator, that what might have been General Toombs's experience I know not, but I know that large bodies of the colored men in Georgia marched to the polls of their own accord with democratic badges pinned upon their lappels, and that colored clubs were organized all over that State. The Senator has had an opportunity of finding out all of these facts. Why does he not show the fact that there Mr. MORTON. I did show it by Mr. Toombs.
Mr. GORDON. By colored democrats, I mean to say.

Mr. MORTON. He is the most distinguished democrat in Georgia to-day. The Senator stood in the same place with this great charge material part of what Toombs had said.

Mr. GORDON. I dislike to interrupt—
Mr. MORTON. I believe I have the floor. I called my friend's attention to it to-day, and he told me then the Legislature had answered it the next day, and he brings the resolutions here and they are just as silent about that as he was; and now my friend here at the end of this discussion says that he denies it. I do not say that he personof this discussion says that he denies it. I do not say that he personally was a party to it. I have not said that. I do not impute anything of that kind to any member on this floor. I did not say that he furnished money for that; but I say that Mr. Toombs said there in the presence of that Legislature that they "carried the election by bribery and intimidation, and you all know it, and," said he, "I would do it again;" and no man said no, but the democratic newspapers said they applauded the statement. The Legislature comes forward with a resolve in regard to another part of Toombs's speech, but wholly passes over their part. Mr. Toombs is a good witness and what he passes over that part. Mr. Toombs is a good witness, and what he said I believe is true, because it corresponds with all the circumstances surrounding the history of that election. When my friend said the Legislature had answered the charge the next day, I expected that they had thought it necessary at the end of three weeks to pass a resolution denying that charge. The Senator from Georgia knew what the charge was precisely, because he quoted a little extract from my speech. The Senator from Georgia did not deny it and put in no protest. I think Mr. Toombs was there at the time. There were witnesses there. The Senator made no denial. The Legislature comes forward and denies another part of Mr. Toombs's speech, an immaterial part, but passes over this very grave charge.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What is the legal inference when part of a document is dealt with, a portion of it denied, and nothing said about

Mr. MORTON. The legal inference, as my friend from Massachusetts, who is a good lawyer, knows, is that he confesses the truth of the rest of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The moral inference, too.
Mr. MORTON. That is the moral inference and the legal inference, and it is a little too late now to put in a denial to those charges. Toombs did not speak from hearsay; he spoke from personal knowledge. Everybody who knows Toombs knows he is a bold man and an able man, and I undertake to say, of course I except my distinguished friends from Georgia here, the two Senators, that otherwise he is to-day the most distinguished and I believe the most popular he is to-day the most distinguished and I believe the most popular democrat in the State of Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He ought to be, for he represents the party well.

Mr. MORTON. One word further. There was one thing more said by my friend from Georgia to which I want to refer. He said that I had offered an insult by saying that he was a monument of the elemency or of the magnanimity of the republican party. That was not intended as an insult at all intended as an insult at all.

Mr. GORDON. I do not want the Senator to do me injustice in that

Mr. GORDON. I do not want the senator to do ne injustice in that respect, if he will allow me a word.

Mr. MORTON. I did not intend to do the Senator injustice.

Mr. GORDON. I knew he did not. It was not that portion of the Senator's remarks which I intended to say were insulting, and I know he did not intend any of them as an insult.

Mr. MORTON. I did not intend so.

Mr. GORDON. But I coupled the remark of his about the elemency of the party with his other remark about the great crime that had been committed, myself among those who had committed it.

Mr. MORTON. I did not, I think, talk about any great crime of

Mr. MOKTON. I did not, I think, talk about any great crime of the Senator. I understand those differences, but I showed that the Senator in his speech at Atlanta had-denounced the republican party in strong terms for its tyranny. It is repeated in different parts of his speech. I was repelling that charge. I think the Senator from Georgia ought not to make that charge upon the republican party. I think he knows full well that the republican party has treated him and other distinguished soldiers with magnanimity, and I do not say and other distinguished soldiers with magnanimity, and I do not say that to injure his feelings.

Mr. GORDON. By no means. The Senator did not injure my feelings by any sort of remark. I appreciate the whole of it. I only insist that his other remarks were offensive to me and offensive to my

Mr. MORTON. I did not intend to offend anybody. I spoke simply of the truth of history. My friend talks about the character of my remarks as attacking the southern people, which I did not do, for I can say to my friend that I have placed the southern men, and I do to-day, in a better position than he does himself; though he does not mean that. My friend at Atlanta made some remarks which might justify me in using some criticism, in speaking of the Pinchback case down there. While they refused to discuss that case here because it was not policy to do so, my friend broke the silence at Atlanta, and he said:

It is said to be capable of proof that he was a convict-

That is Pinchback-

But suppose we should prove it? We should only commend him by that to the confidence of that party! [Laughter and applause.] If we could prove him a jail-bird it would only be to say, "Here is a fit legislator for the southern people:" and in the estimation of that party panegyric would be exhausted did we call him a thief.

It is to that party which is thus described by my friend that he is indebted for his seat on this floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Whose speech is that?

Mr. MORTON. This is Mr. GORDON's speech, the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was it delivered?
Mr. MORTON. It was delivered on the 21st of February, a few days

Mr. EDMUNDS. This year?
Mr. CRAGIN. The day before the Georgia Legislature passed those resolutions which have been read.
Mr. MORTON. The day before they were so inspired by this speech that they passed a resolution denying an immaterial part of Toombs' speech.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They probably denied all they could. Mr. MORTON. My friend from Georgia said:

Mr. MOKTON. My friend from Georgia said:

I trust I shall be there, although I am now paired, to record my vote against him—to do more—to join with my brother democrats in entering upon the records of the country a solemn protest against this outrage upon decency, law, and the Constitution of the country. [Cheers.] But, I repeat, I think they will seat him as a participator in the glories of republican legislation and a sharer in the emoluments which go to republican Congressmen from the South in the shape of the sale of cadetships and the purchase of their votes by scheming corporations. [Laughter and applause.]

For particulars, see Toombs's speech. The Senator talks about the sale of cadetships and the purchase of votes, with that charge resting upon the democratic party of Georgia made by Mr. Toombs, to whom he was making answer, how he carried the election by intimidation and corruption, and he helped to pay the money. I have intended to treat my friend with courtesy, and if I have not done so it has been by inadvertence, but in the course of his remarks down there he said, speaking of the democracy of Georgia:

You have to meet-"the world, the flesh, and "-the Senator from Indiana

You see he carefully excepted from among the enemies of the Georgia democracy the devil. In fact, we may understand they are friends and allies. They have not quarreled with the devil down there. The devil is understood and believed to be the progenitor of that great and noble order of the Ku-Klux, who did so much in revolutionizing the politics of Georgia. It would not do to speak of him disrespectfully. I would not, however, have referred to that except for the Senator having somewhat criticised the style of my remarks.

Mr. GORDON. My friend from Indiana refers to my quotation of a partial passage from the Bible and substitution of himself for another individual. I only want to remark now that I meant to say that Senator had usurped the place of that enemy.

Mr. MORTON. I understand what the Senator meant from what he said. In quoting the usual sentence he struck out "the devil" and inserted "the Senator from Indiana," because they regard the Senator from Indiana as unfriendly to the Georgia democracy and because they regard the devil as being its friend, up-builder, and up-holder. He has done much to establish the party, and when it comes down, it will be because the devil deserts them, which is not likely to occur very soon.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, my only purpose in saying a word to-day is to vindicate myself and my people from imputations that have been cast upon them by two of the Senators who have addressed you. I do not propose to indulge in crimination or recrimination. I do not propose to go back and rake up the ashes of the past and see if I cannot rekindle again a little of the sectional feeling which has brought so much ruin upon this country; but I cannot sit in my seat quietly when it is intimated by Senators on this floor that, because I belong to a section of country which was engaged in the late war, therefore I. or those who come from the same section, cannot be pertherefore I, or those who come from the same section, cannot be permitted to allude in any way to frauds which have been perpetrated and corruption which has been developed, or in any degree to criticise the action of the Administration.

When we are taunted with being here simply by the elemency of the republican party, when we are told that we are here living monu-ments of their magnanimity, I feel it incumbent upon me to deny the fact, and to state that I stand here the peer of the Senator from Ohio, fact, and to state that I stand here the peer of the Senator from Ohio, of the Senator from Indiana, or of any other Senator on this floor; that I stand here with equal right to protect, maintain, and defend the interests of the State of Virginia, and that that State is as much a part of this Government as if she had never seceded, entitled to all its rights, all its benefits, and all its privileges.

It boots not now for us to go back and inquire whether democracy or republicanism was most responsible for the late war through which we have passed. When the student of history hereafter, I will venture the prediction, comes to examine the question in the light of ture the prediction, comes to examine the question in the light of fact and of all antecedent history, he will say that it was not the democratic party as a party which precipitated this war upon the country, but that it was the result of teachings which were rather sectional than political; that one section of this country had been educated in the belief that certain rights inhered in the States, sovereign rights which they had never divested themselves of; that another section was educated in the belief that the National Government was supreme and sovereign, and could wield its powers without reference to the reserved rights of the States; and that these two contrariant opinions were carried on and enforced rather by persons of respective sections than by parties, and at last culminated in the lamentable war through which we have lately passed. I say that, because I know it to be true that through the Southern States men who had never in their lives cast a democratic vote, men who had never permitted themselves to be called democrats, men who had always opposed that party, and some of whom for generations had been arrayed in hostility to it, when this question of antagonism was brought down to the last sharp issue, joined with their own section in the maintenance of the doctrine in which they were educated, and determined to defend it with the sword. All parties South, with individual exceptions only, adhered to the doctrine of State rights, and while thousands and hundreds of thousands of people in the South opposed the policy of secession, few, very few, questioned the right.

That is as much as I propose to say with reference to the responsi-

That is as much as I propose to say with reference to the responsibility for this war; but I would remind Senators who are so fond of taunting us with the position that we then occupied and of reminding us that we are here simply on sufferance and by the elemency and magnanimity of the republican party, that it is held in ethics and in morals that a benefit conferred, when the beneficiary is constantly taunted with it, ceases to be a benefit. If they desire us to respect them as contlawed with magnanimity unparalleled have given them as gentlemen who with magnanimity unparalleled have given us a right to raise our voices in this Chamber, it is possible the claim might be recognized to some extent if they did not talk about it; but lay her frankly that to a certain extent only can it be recognized, and that is viewing the question from the northern stand-point and not from the southern. I believe that we were permitted to come back here to carry out the theory upon which the republican party fought the war, that secession was impracticable, that it was not authorized, and that the unity of this Government had never been impaired by the secession of the Southern States. They did not wish to present themselves to the world in the attitude of claiming that secession had never been consummated by the acts of those States and yet excluding all those States from further participation in the Government. They knew that it would be a political absurdity to suppose that this Government could be carried on with nearly onehalf of its constituent members denied representation in Congress, denied the privilege to hold office, denied all the rights which were enjoyed by the other half, and still set up the claim that the Union had never been severed and that it had always remained intact

As to the dishonest practices which have grown up under the administration of both the democratic and republican parties, I am free to admit, which I do here very frankly, that the democratic party is by no means free from blame in this particular. The history of that party would demonstrate that corruption and fraud have been practiced while it administered this Government. The speech of my friend from Georgia, as I regarded it and construed it, explicitly ad-mitted the fact, and stated that the remedy which he wished to pro-vide (which I do not now propose to maintain, defend, or deny) was predicated upon the distinct proposition that so long as offices were conferred for party service and from party considerations exclusively, without regard to the fitness of the recipient, so long would these abuses exist. I am not forgetful of the fact that the democratic party was the first party in the history of this Government to proclaim the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." As I understand my friend from Georgia, he proposes this as a remedy for the evil, but without in any degree asserting that his own party is not as obnoxious to the charge of corruption growing up under its practices as any other party.

I feel impelled in consequence of a declaration made by one or perhaps both of the distinguished Senators who have addressed us, to say one word in defense of a distinguished citizen of my own State who was alluded to as furnishing an example of that corruption. Allusion was made to the removal of arms, to the stealing of arms, as it was asserted by one of the gentlemen, belonging to the General Government. General Floyd I know always contended, and his friends believe to this day, that in the removal of the arms to southern ar-senals which preceded the advent of the late war, he acted under the right he had as Secretary of War, under the laws as they then existed, to distribute the Southern States' quota of the public arms, and to that extent and no further did he distribute those arms.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is what was his motive in thus abusing or not abusing this trust?

Mr. WITHERS. It matters not what the motive was, as I conceive. As he had a legal right thus to distribute those arms, he violated no law in ethics, in morals, or any other way that I am aware of in distributing them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not disturb the Senator, may I ask him a question at this point? If the doctrine that the motive is immaterial be true, what would the Senator say if some President of the United States, having the legal right, with the assent of the Senate, to make appointments to office, should with the motives of private gain or of benefiting his particular section of country, appoint men to office who would be his creatures and not true public servants? Would not the motive have something to do with that?

Mr. WITHERS. In that case it would.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But not in the case of distributing arms to destroy the country with?

Mr. WITHERS. I do not think the cases are at all parallel, and scarcely analogous.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, as I made allusion to Mr. Floyd, I will state that the charge against Mr. Floyd was that he not only attempted to execute the law with a bad purpose, but that he violated the law. He sent to the Southern States far in excess of their proportion of arms, actually dismantled Pittsburgh and took all the great guns about there that were then unfinished really, and that were only useful when finished thereafter, and sent them to New Orwere only useful when finished thereafter, and sent them to New Orleans for a treasonable purpose. I supposed that was conceded on all

Mr. WITHERS. No; it was not conceded by the friends of General Floyd that he violated any law in the premises. I state this in vindication of his memory, as he no longer lives, and I state it as being the general sentiment and opinion of the people of his own State. It struck me as a very singular circumstance in this discussion that in vindicating the republican party from charges of fraud and corruption in connection with the internal revenue the administration of Mr. Johnson was cited as an example to furnish a democratic parallel to it. It was the first time in my life that I ever heard the administration of Mr. Johnson characterized as a democratic administration. In the plenitude of my ignorance I had supposed that he was nominated on the tieket with Mr. Lincoln by a republican convention and was elected on that ticket as the representative of the republican party in antagonism to the regular democratic ticket which republican party in antagonism to the regular democratic ticket which was put in the field against him, and after the lamented death of Mr. Lincoln, when he succeeded to the Presidency, he, differing in opinion on some points of constitutional law with what proved to be the majority of his party, there was a struggle, an antagonism between the two, he making an effort to carry out his views and being antagonized by the leaders of his party in the Senate and in the other House. But I never heard before that the democratic party were in any degree responsible for this difference, that they in any degree controlled the policy or the appointments of Mr. Johnson's administration: on the policy or the appointments of Mr. Johnson's administration; on the policy or the appointments of Mr. Johnson's administration; on the contrary, I had always been taught to believe from the contem-poraneous history of the times that, in his efforts to effect removals of the appointees of his predecessor, not only in the Internal Revenue but in other Departments, he had been strongly resisted by the repub-lican party, and the incumbents of the offices, as a general thing ap-pointed as republicans, remained thus in office. I mean nearly all appointments which required the senetion of the Senets and the bullappointments which required the sanction of the Senate, and the bulk of them were of that character. I have in conclusion only to say that I believe those gentlemen who represent the Southern States have come here with a firm and deliberate purpose of laboring as best we may to promote the harmony and the interest of this whole country, North as well as South, East as I believe that even the most imbittered partisan will not deny that the prosperity of this country is indissolubly connected with the feeling of harmony and quiet which ought to prevail be-tween the sections, and that, if the sectional antagonisms which cul-minated in the late unfortunate war are to be perpetuated forever by criminations and recriminations on this and upon the other floor of Congress, that prosperity will never come to us. I say further, I do not think it can be truly alleged that the representatives of the Sonthern States on this floor have ever precipitated anything looking like ern states on this hoor have ever precipitated anything looking like a sectional contest here; certainly not since I have been in this body. We are willing, as I have said, to "let bygones be bygones." That has almost passed into a proverb. But I am now deterred to a very considerable extent from carrying it as far as I proposed to do. The professions and concessions which bring me here are affected by a knowledge of the fact that I have observed on more than one occasion, and regretted to observe it, when representatives of southern constitutions is the proposed to the fact that I have observed on the fact that I have constituencies have given utterance to their declarations of fealty to this Union, and their desire to see it perpetuated, and to see it prosper, a smile of incredulity and scorn pass over the faces of prominent members of the other party; and this fact prompts me to be silent on that subject to-day. I prefer that deeds shall speak rather than words; but I say here in conclusion, Senators of the United States, that if you rise to the dignity of the trust which is imposed upon you, if you desire to see the Union of these States re-established again and be in reality and in name a Union, you will trample down these efforts to array one section against another and join hand in hand with all those, come from whatever section they may, who will labor with you earnestly, zealously, and honestly to promote the interests of our common country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will occupy but a moment. There were but two remarks made by the Senator from Indiana or myself that could by possibility have been the basis of the speeches which have been made possibility have been the basis of the speeches which have been made since by the Senators from Georgia and Virginia. What are they? The Senator from Georgia charged the republican party not only with corruption but tyranny. The Senator from Indiana, very properly it seems to me, said that the republican party had never been a tyrannical party; always a magnanimous party; and that the Senator's presence on the floor of the Senate of the United States was a marked example of that fact. It is the only case in history where those who have waged war against a country have within so short a period of time participated in its highest councils. Therefore the remark of the Senator from Indiana was justifiable as a retort upon a charge made against the party to which the Senator from Indiana and I belong.

Again, the Senator from Georgia said that this was an era of fraud corruption, and referred in that connection to the fact that the republican party was in power. My reply was that no doubt fraud and corruption had been exposed, but then there had been other eras of fraud; one in 1840, when defalcation was very common and rather the order of the day, and another in 1860, when the democratic party was in power in all branches of the Government, when fraud and treason occurred, not only stealing money and bonds out of the Treasury of the United States, the Interior Department, and other places, but actually arms were taken by an officer of the United States and carried into  $\frac{1}{8}$  region for the purpose of treasonable hostility against the Government of the United States.

I appeal to the Senate whether these were not proper answers to those charges? I am the last man in the world to desire to renew the battles of the war. I participate entirely in the feelings expressed by the honorable Senator from Virginia in that regard. We in this high deliberative body should join together and by our counsels aid each other in promoting the common good and the general welfare; but I say to Senators distinctly—and I think I am as cool and moder-ate in these matters as most Senators—that when the party to which I belong and the men with whom I am associated are charged wholesale with corrupt purposes and corrupt aims we must be expected to answer in the best way we can to show that any faults that have been developed in our party have been quadrupled in the party that managed this Government before our time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to make a speech, but before I make the motion that I am about to make I beg leave to say a word or two.

The honorable Senator from Georgia and the honorable Senator from Virginia have deprecated the stirring up of sectional strifes and have seemed to impute to us on this side of the Chamber a desire to do that sort of thing. Why did not the honorable Senators think of what the Senator from Georgia said in that public and deliberate way before his own Legislature? Was not that a stirring up sectional strife, and in a manner somewhat more obnoxious and offensive than anything that has been said here or probably ever will be? The places where strifes are stirred up and sectional feelings are excited are not here, but in the respective sections of the country where men on the hustings and on local occasions of public gatherings, for temporary and popular effect or for some better purpose-I do not undertake to say what—resort to styles of oratory and to statements that are applauded to the echo and excite their hearers on one side or the other. There are the places where excitements are stirred up and those are the places where they were stirred up in 1860, and before that time, and which led to the rebellion. They were stirred up in the North by orators on every occasion declaring that liberty and equal rights ought to be the law of the land everywhere. They did not propose to obtain it by violating the Constitution or overturning the Government, but under the law and by it, as far as they could, and they hoped to educate public sentiment for the progress and benefit of mankind. On the other side there were similar orations and on similar occasions when the divine right of slavery and the divine right of States to carry slaves into New York and into the Territories everywhere, as a man would carry his watch or his horse, were equally maintained, and those people of the North who believed otherwise were denounced in the most unmeasured terms; no epithet of opprobrium that could possibly be imagined was left unemployed. when, at last, in a fair and constitutional way, and in spite of the organizations of elections being in the hands of the democratic party in most of the States, Mr. Lincoln was fairly elected the President of the United States, that was the occasion for the tremendous convulsion of bloodshed and of disaster that the southern portion of this country brought upon us. I do not therefore quite like to submit to sit here silently and hear it imputed to the people of the North or to northern Senators that we have stirred up animosities and strifes. We have resisted them, and we will resist them still by the orderly progress of the law.

Ah, Mr. President, it has been said that the republican party has has believed and I suppose does yet, by passing the thirteenth amendment, which struck the fetters from the arms of the slaves and made them freemen. It has tyrannized by passing the fourteenth amendment, ment, which commanded equal rights and provided the means for their enforcement. And it has tyrannized by declaring that color should not disfranchise a man from the right to vote. It has had the tyran-nical disposition to see that these provisions of the Constitution should be put in the form of laws to carry them out. It has passed civilrights bills, making everybody in this country, so far as we had the power, the equal of every other person before the law. It has passed laws to protect the purity and the right of suffrage in elections under the fifteenth amendment; and every democratic vote in both Houses and every democratic speech-maker in the South, and almost in the North, too, but not entirely, have denounced that as encroaching upon the rights of the States and the rights of the people; and they denounce it still.

Mr. President, it is a conflict of ideas that makes this tumult, and this commotion, and this strife. One set of ideas must be right, and the other must be wrong; and the contest must go on, and it shall go on, as far as my voice and aid can make it, until the right prevails. Ah, Mr. President, when liberty of opinion, liberty of person, liberty of person, liberty of person, liberty of person, liberty of person liber to hold property, and liberty to vote is as free and secure in the Southern States as it is in the Northern States, where as a whole every party and every man in a party is protected alike, then there will be peace; but, until that does come there will be no peace, and there ought not to be peace.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. WITHERS. I would state then that the Senator from Vermont

Mr. WITHERS. I would state then that the Senator from Vermont ought to join hands with me and declare that there is peace now, for I take it upon myself to assert so far as my knowledge of my own State goes, and I think I know as much about it as any other man in the State or out of it, that all the things which he has enumerated exist there to-day

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that they do; and yet if you take the records of the courts, if you take the daily history of the journals which are printed in that State, for the last five years, in spite of my friend's disbelief in it, it proves conclusively the opposite. It is no man's declaration, it is no man's belief that makes equality and no man's declaration, it is no man's belief that makes equality and public order; it is the daily history and life of the people; and when you find here and there in every county in every one of these States almost—there may be exceptions; I hope there are; and I hope these exceptions will come to be the rule—that as a whole there is failure of justice and of protection that proceeds from ancient ideas and ancient prejudices and ancient feelings, which may be perfectly natural but which are still perfectly wrong, there is a failure of equality, there is a failure of justice, there is a failure of equal rights.

Why, Mr. President, I do not know personally how it is in Virginia, although I have sometimes had the honor to travel slowly through that State and to know something of its affairs, certainly not nearly so much as my friend does; but in the State of Georgia it is only very recently, as the Senator from Indiana has shown, that on one of the recently, as the Senator from Indiana has shown, that on one of the most solemn public occasions that can occur in a State, in the presence of its sovereign power, the representatives of its people, it was bravely and boldly announced to the satisfaction of everybody who heard the speaker that public affairs are carried on there by means which disgrace civilization and which, if persisted in, must overturn any republic.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?
Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.
Mr. GORDON. I wish to say that I think I know as much about the sentiment of that body to which he refers as the Senator does himself. He says, "to the satisfaction of everybody who heard him." I say, to the satisfaction of nobody who heard him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, I take it for granted that my friend from Georgia was not present on that occasion.

Mr. GORDON. I was very soon after; and I talked with almost every member of the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if my honorable friend was not present, we must take the report of the public prints for what occurred, that there a distinguished citizen of that State, standing up in the presence of its sovereign power, its public legislative body, declares it to their faces that they themselves held their right to their seats by wholesale bribery and corruption and intimidation-everything that should not prevail in a republic, and nothing that should. And what response does that declaration meet with? Is there disapprobation? Is he treated as a contemptible caluminator of the honor and the reputation of that Legislature? By no means; but rapturous applause fills the body of the chamber and runs a circle around the galleries. That the honorable Senator thinks is proof, I suppose, that the State of Georgia is ruled upon true republican principles, and that equality, purity, and justice are the guiding ideas of its statesmen and its citizens! Ah, Mr. President, I dare say that "the sober second thought," or the wise second thought, may have led many members of that Legislature to regret that such an event should have occurred, but such an event could not have occurred untruly without some man in that Legislature or some man in that audience rising, as every honorable man should have risen if he did not know it to be true, and denouncing it on the spot. This after take-back, this after denial, when the consequences of such a statement began this after denial, when the consequences of such a statement began to be felt, has very little weight indeed.

But, Mr. President, as I said, I did not rise to make any speech. I only rose to repel, as far as I am able, the idea that at any time or in any place the people of the North or the republican party in this Chamber or in the other have in any manner stirred up sectional animosities or hostilities, have in any manner assaulted the constitutional rights of any State or any part of its people. They have endeavored to enforce the progress of just ideas in constitutional and lawful ways; and, in every step that they have taken toward it, they have been resisted to the uttermost by the democratic party, and are to this very day. Not one amendment of the Constitution, not one law to carry it dit, not one provision of any kind intended to ameliorate the carry it out, not one provision of any kind intended to ameliorate the condition of the citizens of this country, has received any democratic support. Therefore, Mr. President, as I say, I do not intend to sit still and be told that we are responsible for sectional feeling. But still it is true there is sectional feeling, if you call it that, but it is the sectional feeling of ideas. We believe in these amendments; we believe in these laws as necessary to carry them out; and, so far as we have the constitutional power, we intend to put them in force. Our honorable friends on the other side do not believe in them; and, if the administration of this Government were to go into their hands not a district attorney would ever present an information, not a grand jury would ever find an indictment-nothing in respect of the adjury would ever find an indictment—nothing in respect of the administration of the law would be so carried on as to keep these amendments and these laws from being absolutely obsolete. They might as well never have been passed. I have no doubt of it; and the daily proof of the progress of affairs in these States shows it to my mind with absolute conclusiveness; and I believe the people of this country who are intelligent see it just as clearly as I do.

But, as I said, I did not rise to make any speech; I rose to move that the Search proceed to the consideration of executive business.

that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, which motion I now submit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The subject under discussion having been entertained by general consent, the unfinished business is now the regular order, which is the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Pending which bill, the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., and the Speaker resumed the chair. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. Townsend.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LOUISA G. CHANDLER.

Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2574) for the relief of Louisa G. Chandler; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OBSCENE LITERATURE IN THE MAILS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, as a substitute for House bill No. 1239, a bill (H. R. N. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes, providing a penalty for mailing obscene books and matters contained therein, and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mail; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

REPORT ON LABOR IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That there be printed and bound of the special report "on labor in Europe and America," (Executive Document No. 21), six hundred copies; three hundred for the House and three hundred for the Treasury Department.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and are hereby, authorized to print for the information of this House the letters and testimony in their possession upon the reduction and re-organization of the Army; also, on the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1005) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 8, 1872; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOSES B. SNEDEN.

Mr. PLATT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2576) granting a pension to Moses B. Sneden, late a private of Company H, Eighty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HANNAH A. WOOD.

Mr. PLATT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2577) granting a pension to Hannah A. Wood, widow of Samuel A. Wood, late a second lieutenant in Company M, First New Jersey Volunteers, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be requested to inquire into the case of Edward O'M. Condon, alleged to be a citizen of the United States, who has undergone for nine years penal servitude in an English prison; and what efforts, if any, have been made by the Executive Department to secure his enlargement, and, if no successful efforts have been made in that behalf, then that said committee examine and report whether or not the case comes under sections 2000 and 2001 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provide for the same protection of all naturalized citizens while in foreign countries as fastive-born citizens, and authorizes the President to demand of any foreign government the reasons of such imprisonment and the release of the citizen.

PAYMASTER'S OFFICES ON NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. O'NEILL, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2578) to require the construction of paymaster's offices in all naval vessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC GROUNDS IN WASHINGTON CITY

I wish to offer a resolution which I send to the Mr. HOLMAN. Clerk's desk, calling for some information from one of the bureaus of the Government, for the benefit of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is addressed to the head of a bureau, but that bureau seems to have control of the whole matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army be instructed to transmit to this House tabular statements of the expenditures under each appropriation for use in improvement of public grounds in the city of Washington during the four fiscal years from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, and also for the period from July 1 to December 31, 1875; he shall also state the mode of obtaining supplies under these appropriations, such as piping and valves, hose, concrete and other paving, inclosures of all kinds, fountains, trees, settees. &c., whether by advertisement or otherwise, and transmititemized accounts with names of the parties who furnished such supplies during each year within the periods embraced above; state also whether any salary or per diem besides those regularly appropriated for by Congress are paid from the appropriations for care and improvement of grounds, and, if so, state number and names of such employés, rates, and total amounts paid to them between July 1, 1875, and December 31, 1875; finally, whether any concrete pavements have been made under appropriations for the Washington Aqueduct, and, if so, state the names of contractors, quantities, and rates paid to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the absence of explanation it would seem that

Mr. HOLMAN. In the absence of explanation it would seem that this inquiry should be addressed to the Secretary of War. But I find, on examining the statute, that this branch of the public service is by law placed specially under the Chief of Engineers; so that the resolution calls for information out of the regular course, that is, from the head of a Department.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

* ARMY SUPPLIES TAKEN FROM ALIENS.

Mr. HATCHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2579) for the relief of aliens who have filed a declaration to become citizens, for stores and supplies taken by the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. CAULFIELD. By request, I submit the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the House whether the Washington Market Company, a corporation organized under and by authority of an act of the Congress of the United States approved March 20 1870, has complied with all the provisions of said act of incorporation; and if, in the judgment of said committee, said company has not fully complied with the provisions of its said charter, the committee are hereby instructed to report a bill directing the Attorney-General of the United States to institute proper legal proceedings to forfeit said franchise, and restore to the possession of the Government of the United States the land granted by said charter. That said committee be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to inquire and report to the House by what authority the said market company demands and receives a revenue from persons vending articles of produce on or near the public reservation or streets outside of the land granted by its charter, to wit, on or near Louislana avenue between Ninth and Eleventh streets northwest, in the city of Washington, and also to report such measure as in their judgment may be proper under the circumstances.

Mr. CALLETELD. Unou reflection. I think these resolutions should

Mr. CAULFIELD. Upon reflection, I think these resolutions should be modified. As they now read they require the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to make this investigation. I think the investigation should be made by the Committee for the District of Columbia. I ask that the resolutions may be modified in that re-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify the resolutions before they are voted upon.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then I will modify the resolutions so as to direct the Committee for the District of Columbia to make this investigation.

The resolutions, as modified, were adopted.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The petition and papers in the claim of the heirs of William A. Graham were reported back to the House by the Committee on Patents and laid upon the table. That was done under a misapprehension, and I ask consent that they be taken from the table and recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

STATE GRANGE OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. CATE. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of the State Grange of Wisconsin, and that the accompanying resolutions be read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. If the resolutions are read, of course they will go in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States ought to establish a uniform rate of interest to be charged by the national banks, not to exceed 6 per cent.

2. Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress to foster and protect the internal commerce of the country at least equally with our foreign commerce, and to do so is in duty bound to improve our natural, and when necessary to make artificial, water-routes; and we believe the Fox and Wisconsin River route, if improved, will be the most efficient and economical route from the Northwest to the seaboard; and we respectfully ask Congress to complete said improvement at the earliest practicable day.

3. Resolved, That the act of the last Congress increasing postage upon transient printed matter, also upon seeds and merchandise, only benefits the rich monopolies that have become fat upon the hard earnings of the people, and ought to be immediately repealed.

4. Resolved, That the patent laws as they now are give undue advantage to monopolics, and ought to be so modified as to equally protect the interests of the inventor and the user of the patented articles.

5. Resolved, That a copy of resolutions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 be sent to each Congressman of the State of Wisconsin by the master of the State Grange.

Mr. CONGER. I move that each subject of this memorial be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suggest what committee?

Mr. CONGER. I thought the Chair might do that without my assistance

The SPEAKER. The Chair could do it better with the assistance of the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. There are several subjects embraced in the memo-

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. There was no objection, and the resolutions were referred accord-

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2580) for the relief of Thomas Sheridan, of Washington City, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF DESTITUTE COLORED WOMEN.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from the National Association of Destitute Colored Women and Children; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE EXPENDITURES

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Accounts the following resolution; which was read, considered, Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be allowed a clerk for the further term of one month from the 11th day of March, 1876, at $4 per day.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of opening the Indian Territory to settlement by white men, establishing a form of government adapted to the peculiar wants of that Territory, giving to its inhabitants the rights of citizenship and homestead, and dividing the remaining lands according to the rights and equities of parties entitled thereto, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

GENERAL BABCOCK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a House resolution of the 3d instant, instructions, orders, &c., relative to the court of inquiry in the case of General Babcock; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIM OF JAMES ALLENDER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to an inquiry from the Committee on Commerce, a report of the Chief of Engineers on the claim of James Allender for damage to his mill property at Hoard's Rocks, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Com-

ARMY OFFICERS IN DIPLOMATIC OR CONSULAR SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution of the 23d ultimo, a copy of the report of the Adjutant-General giving the names of officers of the Army who since March 20, 1868, have held diplomatic or consular office and who yet have their names on the register of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-five minutes before one o'clock. The regular order this morning is the call of committees for reports of a public nature. The call rests with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1993) to repeal section 11 of the act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," and to enact a substitute therefor. This is a bill regulating the compensation and salaries of postmasters. I move that the bill be printed as amended, and made a special order for Thursday next after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to reserve the legislative appropriation bill from interference by this bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I have no objection to that.

The motion of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, was agreed to.

POST-ROUTES IN TEXAS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, also, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with a favorable recommenda-tion, the bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas

The bill was read. It establishes the following route:

A post-route from Paris, Lamar County, Texas, by way of Cotton Plant, in said county, and by way of Cooper, in Delta County, in said State, to Sulphur Springs, in Hopkins County, in said State; also, a post-route from Bonbam, in Fannin County, Texas, by way of Ladonia, in said county, and Ben Franklin, in Delta County, Texas, to Cooper, in said county.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the passage of this particuthe last Congress it very often happened that post-routes in the House bill were struck out by the Senate; and the only way sometimes in which we could secure the establishment of those routes was times in which we could secure the establishment of those routes was by insisting upon not passing the bill until our post-routes had been incorporated by the Senate. I interpose no objection to this bill; I am in favor of post-routes everywhere; but I think it might be better that these should go into a general bill, as is usual in such cases, unless there is some special reason to the contrary.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. This bill had passed the Senate before the regular post-route bill was reported to the House; and therefore these routes were not included in that bill.

Mr. CONCER. I believe there is another general bill preparing.

Mr. CONGER. I believe there is another general bill preparing. But I make no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JACKSON LAVENBURG.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Jackson Lavenburg for relief, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims; which motion was agreed to.

THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. STOWELL, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2581) to amend section 3887 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 3887 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding the following:

Provided, That any person or persons sending matter of the third class may write upon the wrapper thereof, without any additional charge, the name and address of the sender, preceded by the word "from," and also the name and number of the articles inclosed; and such additional writing shall not subject such package to any other or higher rate of postage than that chargeable in the absence of such writing. any other writing.

Mr. STOWELL. As I have been asked for explanation by several

Mr. STOWELL. As I have been asked for explanation by several members of the necessity for the passage of this bill, I will do so very briefly. Section 3887 reads as follows:

Any person who shall inclose or conceal any letter, memorandum, or other thing in any mail matter not charged with letter postage, or make any writing or memorandum thereon, and deposit or cause the same to be deposited for conveyance by mail at a less rate than letter postage, shall for every such offense be liable to a penalty of $5, and such mail matter or 'inclosure shall not be delivered until the postage is paid thereon at letter rates. But no extra postage shall be charged for a card printed or impressed upon an envelope or wrapper.

The bill is simply intended to allow a person sending any matter of the third class, a newspaper for instance, to write on the outside of the wrapper his name, so as to convey the information to the person who receives the package that he sent that package and so that it will pass through the mail without being subject to letter postage. The Postmaster-General has construed this law literally, so that if there is any writing of any kind either on the inside or outside of a package of third-class matter, that package shall pay first-class postage. Gentlemen frequently send communications or papers or packages of third-class matter, and desire the receiver should know who ages of third-class matter and desire the receiver should know who sent it, but that information cannot be conveyed at present under the law without the package paying first-class postage.

This measure has been recommended by the Postmaster-General in his annual report, and by Postmaster-Generals in previous years. Two years ago a similar bill passed the House but failed to pass the Senate because of the lateness of the session. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have instructed me to report this bill to the House, and I am quite sure there will be no objection to it on the part of any member of the House, its object being understood.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WRITTEN LEGAL MATTER.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, made an adverse report upon a bill (H. R. No. 471) fixing the rate of postage on written legal matter, and for other purposes; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEPOSITS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1852) to amend sections 5490 and 5497 of the Revised Statutes, relating to deposits of public money, and the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT, from the same committee, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1795) to amend section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the same be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency; which motion was agreed to.

EXTRADITION.

Mr. KNOTT, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 5271 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

In every case of complaint and of a hearing upon the return of the warrant of arrest, any depositions, warrants, or other papers, or copies thereof, offered in evidence, shall be admitted and received for the purposes of such hearing if they shall be properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received as evidence of the criminality of the person so apprehended, by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped; and the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign country shall be proof that any such deposition, warrant, or other paper, or copy thereof, is authenticated in the manner required of this section.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

In line 16 strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "by," so that it will read "authenticated in the manner required by this section."

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to say a single word in explanation of this bill. If gentlemen will turn to section 5271 of the Revised Statutes they will find that in cases of a hearing upon the return of warrants of arrest in cases of extradition, it is provided that copies only of depositions and other papers can be received in evidence. By some singular oversight the provision as it stood in the law, that originals should be read, was left out; and this bill is simply to restore the law as it was formerly, in order that original papers, as well as copies, might be received in evidence.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a suggestion. Might not the object of the gentleman from Kentucky be attained as well by saying "prima facie evidence," instead of saying "proof." According to the bill the certificate of a consul or minister makes any matter proof. I suppose all that would be desired would be that it should be received as prima facie evidence until disputed.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from Michigan does not seem to comprehend the object of the bill. The object of this bill is not to prescribe at all what shall be proof, but simply to prescribe what may be received in evidence. As the law now stands only copies of papers are received in evidence, while the originals are not receivable in evidence at all what shall be proof, but simply to prescribe what may be received in evidence, while the originals are not receivable in evidence. are received in evidence, while the originals are not receivable in evidence at all. This is simply to provide that the originals may be received in evidence, as they were receivable before the revision. It is evidently an omission in the Revised Statutes which this bill is designed to correct. I call for the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Has any difficulty been experienced by the State Department in consequence of this matter standing as it does in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. KNOTT. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that. A difficulty, as I am informed by the Secretary of State, has already arisen in the construction of the Revised Statutes, a case having occurred where originals were presented and were not allowed to be used in evidence. Hence the importance of immediate favorable extinue on the bill. ble action on the bill.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrosssed, it was accordingly read the time, and

WILLIAM W. HANDLIN.

Mr. LORD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of William W. Handlin, formerly judge of the first district court of New Orleans, for relief; and moved that the same do lie on the table, and that the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. ASHE, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 428) to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; and the same was laid on the table.

JUDICIAL COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ASHE also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 20) to amend the four-teenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURT OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CAULFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, dc., That instead of the times now provided by law, the regular terms of the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall hereafter be held at the times and places following; but when any of said dates shall fall on Sunday the terms shall commence on the following Monday: At Clarksburgh, on the 1st days of March and September; at Wheeling, on the 1st days of April and October; and at Charleston, on the 1st days of May and October. And all pending process, suits, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner and with the same effect, except as to time, as if this act had not passed.

The substitute proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

A bill to prescribe the days for holding the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia.

the district of West Virginia.

Be it enacted, dec. That hereafter the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall be held at the times and places following; but when any of said dates shall fall on Sunday the terms shall commence on the following Monday, to wit: At the city of Wheeling, on the 1st day of March and the 1st day of September; at Clarksburgh, on the 1st day of April and the 1st day of October; at Charleston, on the 1st day of May and the 1st day of November; and at Martinsburgh, on the 1st day of June and the 1st day of December; and all pending process, rules, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner and with the same effect as to each as if this act had not passed: Provided, however, That the terms of court hereby authorized to be held at Martinsburgh shall be void and of no effect unless all buildings and conveniences necessary to the holding of said court shall be furnished by the proper authorities of the county of Berkeley, free and clear of all cost and expense to the United States.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was adopted, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. CAULFIELD, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, re-

Mr. CAULFIELD, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1485) to provide for the expenses of district judges when holding court out of their own districts.

The bill was read. It provides that whenever a district judge holds a district or circuit court out of his own district in pursuance of an order of the circuit judge or circuit justice, under section 591 or section 596 of the Revised Statutes, the expenses of such district judge, not exceeding $10 per day, to be certified by him, shall be paid by the marshal of the district in which he so holds court as a part of the expenses of the court, and shall be allowed in the marshal's accounts; and the provisions of this act shall apply to all courts held by district judges out of their own district since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1876.

The amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee was as follows:

In line 8 insert the word "six" instead of the word "ten;" so that it will read not exceeding $6 per day."

"not exceeding $6 per day."

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is subject to the point of order that it involves an appropriation.

Mr. McCRARY. With reference to the point of order I desire to call attention to a statute which may have some effect on the decision of the point. The law as it now stands provides for the payment of the expenses of the district judges in the southern district of New York at the rate of $10 per day. The effect of this bill is to reduce the payment of the judges in that part of the country, and to authorize the payment of $6 per diem in other parts of the country. I do not know how it can be said by any gentleman on the floor or by the Speaker that the effect of the bill will be to take any money from the Treasury. In one part of the country it is a reduction and in another part of the country it provides for payment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule upon this question. The Chair does not think that the fact that the bill may not in the aggregate take money out of the Treasury has much to do with de-termining this point of order. If the bill creates new demands upon the Treasury and new appropriations not required under existing law, the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and that is what the bill does. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

TRANSFER OF CASES FROM STATE TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 248, a bill (H. R. No. 2582) to regulate the removal of causes from State to United States courts; which was read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill provides that applications for the re moval of suits from a State court to a United States court shall be made by petition to said State court at the time the defendant enters his appearance therein, and not afterward.

The second section provides that no suit of a civil nature at law or in equity arising under the Constitution or laws, or under treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, or in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States or a controversy between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between a citizen of a State and the subject of a foreign State, shall be removed from the State court to a court of the United States unless the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $2,000, and in no case shall such removal be allowed upon the application of the plaintiff.

The third section repeals all acts or parts of acts which are in con-

The third section repeals an acts of parts of acts which are in conflict with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HURD. This bill, as its title indicates, proposes to limit the right of removal of causes from State to the United States courts.

Mr. FORT. I desire to inquire if this bill has been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been printed.

Mr. HURD. The original bill was printed, but the substitute has not been printed.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would like to inquire whether an amendment would now be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be, unless the gentleman having charge of

The SPEARER. It will be, unless the gentleman having charge of the bill declines to yield for it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire, then, to suggest to the gentleman having this bill in charge that, and I make the statement from my own experience, the petition ought to be verified by oath.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The first section of the bill does not provide for such verification of the petition.

Mr. HURD. After I have submitted to the House some words of explanation of the bill I will hear the gentleman from Indiana. The purpose of the bill, as indicated in its title, is to limit the right of removal of causes from the courts of the States to the courts of the The limitations fixed by the bill are three: First, that the application for removal shall be made in the State court at the time the defendant enters his appearance therein, and not afterward; secondly, that no cause shall be removed unless the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of $2,000; and, thirdly, that in no case shall removal be permitted where the application for such removal has been made by the plaintiff.

By the twelfth section of the act of 1789 it was provided that the removal might be made by the defendant in a State court when he made his application at the time he entered his appearance in such State court. That provision remained unchanged until 1866. In that year a law was passed by Congress authorizing in certain cases the removal of a cause where the application was made at any time before its trial. The cases contemplated by the act were those in which an action was brought against a non-resident defendant, together with other defendants, residents of the State in which the action was brought; and removal was permitted to the non-resident defendant in cases where an injunction was sought against him and where his rights might be adjudicated without the presence of his co-defendants in the cause.

In 1867 another law was passed which provided that, where it appeared to the State court that local prejudices were likely to affect the action of the court, there might be a removal upon the application either of the plaintiff or the defendant at any time before the cause was tried. By the adoption of the Revised Statutes these provisions were continued in the statutes of the United States, so that before the passage of the law of last winter the law stood practically that no removal could occur except where the defendant made the application for the removal at the time he entered his appearance in the State court. The exception of practical importance to this rule was where, on the ground of local prejudice, either the plaintiff or the defendant might apply for a removal, and then the application might be made at any time before the trial occurred.

By the statute of 1875 it was provided that in all cases removals might be had where the amount exceeded the sum of $500 where application was made at or before the term at which the cause might be first tried. Thus stands the law to-day.

The change proposed by the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as already indicated, is in the first respect that the application shall be made at the time the defendant enters his appearance in the State court. The committee see no reason why the ordinary rules that govern litigations in other instances should not prevail here, namely, that where the defendant has once submitted himself to the jurisdiction of a court he shall abide by his acknowledgment of that jurisdiction and shall remain in the court until that jurisdiction has adjudicated

In addition to that, the committee felt that it was better to take this as the rule, for the reason that it was the provision incorporated in the statute of 1789; it remained unchanged until 1866; it had received repeated judicial constructions, and was perfectly understood by the legal profession of the whole country.

The second change proposed in the law as it now stands is in increasing the amount from $500 to $2,000. The reasons which prompted your committee to recommend this change were, first, that from the beginning of the Government $500 has been the sum fixed as the limit; and in the present condition of our currency, $2,000 can be said to be but little more in value than the $500 of nearly a century ago. And in the second place, the committee would suggest, upon this point, that it would be unfair to compel litigants who have the right of appeal in the State courts to go into the United States court, where they would lose the right of appeal; for, as provided by the law of to-day, unless the amount in controversy exceeds $2,000 in the circuit court of the United States, there can be no review. It would therefore be unjust to the litigant in the State court to compel him to lose the right of appeal by allowing a removal where the sum in controversy was less than $2,000.

The third change proposed by your committee is that no plaintiff in any instance should have the right of applying for a removal. Your committee think it is a wise change, for the reason that when a plaintiff, understanding all the facts and circumstances, has selected the court in which the question he makes should be tried, he should abide by his decision; as he has made his bed, so in it he should lie.

But in addition to the particular reasons which prevailed upon the committee to make the recommendations they have, there were certain general reasons prompting us to make this report. And first the great increase of business in the courts of the United States pressed upon our judgment in making the recommendation. The rapid growth our population, the easy methods of intercommunication between the States, the establishment of great corporations in one State doing business in the other States, have so clogged the dockets of the courts of the United States that delays are frequent and necessary, so that justice in many instances is practically denied. The facts upon this point were ably stated by my colleague on the committee, the gentlepoint were ably stated by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary,] in a speech made by him the other day in defense of the bill for the re-organization of the judiciary. I refer to them to illustrate the position I now maintain. That judiciary bill, then approved by the House, relieving the Supreme Court, is supplemented by this bill which proposes to close the doors of the Federal courts to a large class of cases that are now easily and unnecessarily transferred to them.

In the second place, your committee thought that in most instances the ends of justice would be better promoted by allowing cases to be tried by the State courts, where the expenses of litigation are less than in the Federal courts; where parties can have the matters in which they are interested adjusted near to their homes. Your committee believes this measure to be a step in the right direction, because it proposes to cut off the opportunity of compelling parties to go to distant courts for the settlement of their rights.

And, in the third place, many of your committee were full of apprehension as to the growing jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The rights of the States, one by one, have been so absorbed within the Federal jurisdiction that the distinction between the reserved rights of the States and the delegated powers of the General Government has almost been lost sight of. Valuable rights have been sacrificed by compromise because of fear of litigation in the Federal courts. The threat of removal to a Federal court has cost many an honest litigant his cause. The wants and necessities of the people require that there shall be limitations upon this power. Your committee believe that this bill wisely imposes these limitations, and that it will at least aid in bringing the country back to the better days of the Republic, when justice was administered at the people's doors, and when the Federal authority was not invoked unless there was a manifest injustice in denying it. For these reasons your committee unanimously ask the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

tion?

Mr. HURD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. There is very great complaint in many of the States with respect to corporations organized by virtue of act of Congress. As I understand the law now, such corporations can have suits in which they may be a party removed from the State courts to the United States courts where the amount involved is over $500. When, for instance, a railroad company chartered by act of Congress has its business office in New York or Boston, while its road passes through distant States, the company claims the right to remove causes from the State courts to the United States courts. Now, I would like to know whether this bill includes such cases; whether it refers to corporations existing by virtue of act of Congress ?

Mr. HURD. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman, I will say that the bill proposed is universal in its terms and application, and therefore it will govern such cases as the gentleman suggests as well as those to which I have particularly referred. I will say, in the second place, in answer to the suggestion, that the Judiciary Committee has already under consideration one or two measures which look to the relief which he indicates and which may be reported favorably at some future day; at least that subject is now under consideration in the Judiciary Committee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

Mr. HURD also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1480 a bill (H. R. No. 2583) to provide for holding of terms of the district and circuit court of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that there shall be two terms of the United States district and circuit courts for the district of Indiana held in the city of Fort Wayne, Indiana, in each year from and after the passage of the act; the time and length of the terms to be fixed by the judges of the court respectively.

The second section provides that the clerk of the district court for the district of Indiana, the marshal and district attorney for the district, shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices respectively for those courts; and the clerk and marshal shall each appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices at Fort Wayne, and who shall in the absence of their principal do and perform all the duties appertaining to the offices respectively.

The third section provides that each of the courts named shall be held in a building to be provided for that purpose by the State or municipal authorities without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT JACKSON, TENNESSEE.

Mr. HURD also, from the same committee, reported a substitute for House bill No. 366, to provide for holding terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Jackson, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired ?
The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill to carry out the Hawaiian treaty. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Doug-LAS. ]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the Hawaiian

Mr. BLAND. I believe there was another special order for to-day; I do not know whether it takes precedence of this; I refer to the bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Durham] in respect to mining patents. I am requested to state that the gentleman from Kentucky is sick; and I would like to have the bill postponed, to be taken up immediately after the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York to go into the Committee of the Whole is in order. Although another bill may have been made a special order for consideration in the House, it is competent for the House to disregard that order and go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill like

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Before the question is put upon my motion I would like the privilege of stating that I propose, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to bring this debate to a close to-morrow. Therefore it is that I am desirous of going into the Committee of the Whole at the earliest possible moment to-day so as to be able to close the debate to-morrow and have the Hawaiian treaty bill dis-be made the special order immediately after the Hawaiian treaty bill and the legislative appropriation bill have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] refer to the act entitled "An act to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes, concerning mineral lands?"

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that bill being made the special order after the Hawaiian treaty bill and the legislative appropriation bill shall have been disposed of?

Mr. HOAR. Does that give it precedence over all other orders, or is this merely a postponement?

is this merely a postponement?

The SPEAKER. It is only a postponement.

Mr. HOAR. Then I do not suppose it requires unanimous consent. The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] desires to make a request of the House.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.
Mr. LAMAR. And I shall need all the indulgence of the House, as I am very unwell.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to preserve order in the

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I have come from my sick-bed here to set myself right in reference to an act which was presented yesterday by a member of the House as a breach of the privileges of the House. I send to the desk, sir, the remarks which I wish to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Hoar. I rise to a question of privilege. I observe in the Record of this morning, of the debates and proceedings of yesterday on the privileged question which was presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clymer] and by his associates, that there has been added to the report of the debates by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Lamar,] whom, I regret not to see in his seat, a note explanatory of the position taken by the gentleman from Mississippi in that debate. I observed the other day that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hill.] added to the report of the debate in which he took part a note giving a further and fuller extract from some document that he had previously cited.

Now, I do not claim for a moment that either of those gentlemen intended to commit any impropriety, or that anything in the addition which they made to their remarks in either case would be in the least umpleasant or disagreeable to the House or to any person who took part in the debate. But it is obvious that the correctness of this record of the debates, its absolute fidelity, is the protection and the only protection of all of us in our public lives here against misrepresentation elsewhere. One of two things must exist: we must be judged by the country from newspaper abstracts, sometimes misunderstanding, sometimes misrepresenting what we say, or we must have this an absolutely faithful record, to which for our visidication we can at all times appeal for what actually took place in the House, withits defects, its merits, its literal accuracy.

I have therefore taken an occasion when there is no personal ground for complaint of the gentlemen for what they have done, to arrest in its inception the practice of adding anything—I do not speak now of grammatical or slight corrections which do not change the substance—the practice of adding, as a note or as a matter of substance, anything to the record of our debates, as a violation of the privileges of this House. And I am sure that the two gentlemen

Mr. LAMAR, (not rising to his feet, but sitting in his chair.) Mr. Speaker, at the close of the debate referred to, while the House was nearly in the act of adjournment, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sampson] came to my seat, where I was engaged in conversation with one of my colleagues, [Mr. SINGLETON,] and said to me, "Mr. Lamar, I think you have perhaps stated too strongly the liability of Marsh to indictment under the testimony before that committee." He then, sir, referred me to the provisions of the statute which I had looked at in the morning, but which, in the hurry of extemporaneous cogitation, had fallen out of my mind at the moment. In the course cogitation, had fallen out of my mind at the morner. In the course of the discussion I became convinced that I had stated too strongly his liability upon that testimony alone, while the contract, which was in the possession of that committee, if delivered up, would certainly lead to his indictment by the production of the other party to it, although it would not be sufficient of itself alone, excluding his own deposition, to sustain the indictment. And I said to him, "I believe, it is also be a likely and the sufficient of the said to him, "I believe, it is said to him, "I believe, deposition, to sustain the indictment. And I said to him, "I believe, sir, you are right and I was wrong in stating it quite so strongly. I cannot modify or alter the remarks which I made in the debate, but I will add a note with my name signed to it, calling attention to the statute, and give you credit for bringing mine to it."

Now, sir, I have all my life cultivated a deep and abiding sense of the importance and sanctity and authority of truth. If I could reach my ideal, it would be an absolute surrender to it as the law of my life, to be severed from it by positive townstation, interest passion nor am to be severed from it by neither temptation, interest, passion, nor ambition. And when this error I had committed was presented to me, bition. And when this error I had committed was presented to me, an impulse rose in my mind to correct and repair it, as naturally as the fountain springs from the earth. That night at twelve o'clock, when I was racked with pain, the idea occurred to me that I had not done so, and, rising from my bed, I addressed this note to the printer and asked him not to incorporate it in the debates, not to impair the fidelity of the RECORD, not to change or add to or subtract from one word that had fallen from my lips, but simply to append this note outside of the debates, constituting no part of them, simply in the interest of truth and in the interest of courtesy to a fair, modest, and intelligent political opponent.

That, sir, constitutes what has been characterized, in no unkind spirit I admit, but still characterized, as a breach of the privileges of this House and connected with a practice which has been the subject of animadversion and unfavorable criticism as an abuse of the privileges of this House, in revising and correcting speeches made on this floor. I submit, sir, it is neither. In my feeble condition I have not been able to look over the past debates, but I have distinctly in my recollection the great debates recorded in the old Congressional Globe where such Titans as Webster and Benton and Calhoun and Clay grappled in mental conflict, and many places are marked with asterisks and marginal annotations as appended by those gentlemen. I have pictured in my mind now, sir, how they looked upon the pages of the Globe; but I am too unwell and feeble to refer to them.

I simply ask, sir, whether in this note, which has not put one word in the debates, which no child could be mistaken about, which no fool would ever imagine belonged to any part of the debate, I have done anything that is inconsistent with the courtesy and fidelity of the fair debater or the lover of truth? Of course, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts disclaimed any such imputation, and I thank him for that; but as he has connected this act with what may or may not have been an abuse, I must say and protest that I have only done that which I believed to be consistent with the rules of the House, as sanctioned by its unbroken usage.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar.] closes his remarks, I desire to call his attention to the question whether the foot-note to which he refers may not possibly be in error, and the original text of the speech correct. The statement was made by several gentlemen in debate yesterday that there was there an ad-mission that the witness Marsh could not be indicted on the testimony in this case. In view of what has been said about it, I call the gentleman's attention to this question. I call the attention of my friend from Mississippi, and of other gentlemen, to the fact that the contract signed by Marsh was part of the evidence, with several other written statements signed by him, showing complicity in these frauds. I submit, therefore, to the gentleman whether the text of his speech was not correct, that the Secretary of War could not be indicted and that the witness Marsh could; and whether the error is not probably in the foot-note?

Mr. LAMAR. I cannot enter into that question now.
Mr. HOAR. I ask the House to yield to me the same indulgence as it has yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi for a few words of explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMPSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment to say just a word or two, as allusion has been made

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the gentleman will wait till after I get

Mr. SAMPSON. I only ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I yield to the gentleman if he prefers to speak now.

Mr. SAMPSON. The impression may probably prevail from what has taken place, the fact of the insertion of this note in the RECORD has taken place, that has been given here to-day, that there was and the explanation that has been given here to-day, that there was some desire on my part, in calling the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the existence of the statute of 1861, to have this explanation appear in the RECORD. I simply want to state now that that was not the purpose of the conversation, and, as I understand the gentleman from Mississippi, he does not now desire to convey the impression that it was through any wish or desire of my own that that note appeared. In fact, I believe I stated to him, when he mentioned that he would give me the credit of saying that I had called his attention to it, that I did not desire that that should appear in the REC-order is that I and not desire that that should appear in the RECorder I did not mention it for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. I made up my mind some time ago that I would take an opportunity when one presented itself of calling the attention of my associates on this floor to the great importance of all of us being able to say to the entire country that the RECORD is an official statement of exactly what we say here, nothing more and nothing less; so that no other evidence of what occurred in this House would ever be received to overthrow it.

Now, sir, there are occasions when very earnest and excited debates take place which arouse partisan feeling, which excite anger on the part of gentlemen who take part in them. If I had called attention to an alteration made in a speech in connection with such an occasion as that, it is obvious that it would at once have brought before the House what was foreign to the real purpose, to wit: The correctness of the report of what was said. I accordingly thought I would select the first occasion when no actual impropriety had been either intended or committed; when some member had made an addition which every member would be perfectly willing should be made: so that nobody member would be perfectly willing should be made; so that nobody would think there was anything personally unpleasant in the suggestion. And I thought I had found that occasion. I supposed that the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Georgia would both understand, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hill] said he did, that it was because of the eminent propriety, in the particular instances, of what they had done; and, because I could not be supposed to intend to impute any impropriety in the act, that I had selected that occasion for making the statement. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which the gentleman from Mississippi did not have read from the report, but what I said yesterday to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Hoar. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment? I said (and I presume the gentleman so understood me) that I selected an instance in which there could be no possible suggestion of any impropriety, in order to call the attention of the House to the matter, rather than take an occasion about which there might be some feeling.

Mr. Hill. I appreciate the remark; I am not complaining of anything the gentleman has said.

Mr. Hill. r appreciate the remark; I am not complaining of anything the gentleman has said.

Mr. Hoar. The addition made by the gentleman from Mississippi, which the gentleman may not have seen, is the statement that he was not aware at a certain time of a certain statute. Of course the House would be entirely willing in this case that such an addition should be made; every member would consent to it. But it changes the attitude of the debate.

Mr. HOAR. Now the gentleman from Mississippi will, I am sure, understand, what I am sure every gentleman who heard what took place yesterday understood, that I had taken the case of an act of evident propriety for my text, and I said so. But I am bound to say to the gentleman from Mississippi, as he is now in his seat, that I do the gentleman from Mississippi, as he is now in his seat, that I do not agree that it is a very safe rule to permit any gentleman in this House to have added any note in the interest of truth or otherwise. There are a good many precedents, as the gentleman said. There have been gentlemen in this House who did not possess the eminent sense of propriety which characterizes the gentleman from Mississippi in times past; I will not intimate that there is any such person here now, but there may be such persons in the future in some other House. Now, is it safe to trust to the sense of propriety of a particular person the discretion of making additions to the public other House. Now, is it safe to trust to the sense of propriety of a particular person the discretion of making additions to the public record of our debates. I was about to make a suggestion from this very debate, but I will only say that in one case, if a note of two lines only could have been added, following the very precedent of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Lamar,] it would have put a gentleman who took part in that debate in a position on the record which might be much more honorable to him to assume, and the fact that he was not put in that position is a part of the triumph of his antagonists over him in the debate. I do not wish to suggest exactly what I mean, but I say now that in my own judgment there is but one course for us to pursue. We cannot put this responsibility on the reporters. We should be very angry if a reporter declined to do what members of the House had been in the habit of doing, because he deemed it not proper, in a particular instance. I think the only safety for members of this House is to have the country understand that this Record is as exact, as unchangeable, as imperishable as the twelve tables of the law, and this is a thing which our reputation for all times, contemporaneous and with posterity, demands at our hands.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to add one word to what I have said.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will allow me to say that in the old times to which he has referred, in Webster's time, the reporters were not appointed by the House, but were the reporters of Gales & Seaton. I will agree with the gentleman, however, that since we have had official reports the practice has existed to a very much greater extent than it did previous to that time.

Mr. LAMAR. Just one word in reply, sir. The remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] which I sent to the desk contained precisely the same disclaimer which he repeated in his remarks which he sent to the desk, and I gave him credit for that in my first remarks. I wish to say this, sir, that the gentleman in his speech declares that it is proper and consistent with usage to correct grammatical errors and to omit personal offenses.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will pardon me; I said I was not dealing with that question at the time. He will find that I did not say that it was either proper or improper, but that I was not dealing with the question at the time.

Mr. LAMAR. I shall not pursue the matter; I have not strength. I submit that in my opinion, sir, I have not departed in any respect from the rules of this House sanctioned by its usage.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he will not concur with me in the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to inquire whether it be expedient to give any further directions to the reporters of debates, in regard to the matter of reporting the debates.

I do not wish to suggest any policy.

Mr. BANNING. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] that the House resolve itself in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill in relation to the Hawaiian treaty.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

MANAGEMENT OF THE SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution: which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into the management and control of the soldier's homes and national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers, and report in writing thereon; also what reforms in the management should be made for the comfort and welfare of said soldiers.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I now insist upon the regular HAWAHAN TREATY.

The motion of Mr. Wood, of New York, was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order, which is House bill No. 962, to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Chairman, in advocating the measure now before the House, I will endeavor to be as brief as possible. To what bas already been said in the able and exhaustive arguments presented by my friend Mr. Wood and those who have preceded me, I feel that I can add but little. I would not, however, be discharging my duty to the people of the Pacific coast were I to let pass unanswered some statements made by the opponents of this measure.

In this age of progress and advanced civilization I supposed that every citizen of our land was alive to the commercial interests of our common country, and that this measure, fraught with so many adcommon country, and that this measure, fraught with so many advantages to our trade and commerce, would receive the united sanction of the members of this House. Giving to us, as it does, the exclusive trade in iron, steel, and all agricultural implements manufactured from iron and steel, I rather expected my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] to not only give the bill his sanction, but, with that ability for which he is noted, to vigorously urge its passage. I thought my friends from the South would support it with a zeal equaled only by the mechanics of the North; while my friends from the West would join hands with their southern brethren, and that for this measure there would have been an undivided support. But to the West would join hands with their southern brethren, and that for this measure there would have been an undivided support. But to my surprise I find the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] opposing it, because the taxable property of the Hawaiian Islands does not equal or approximate that of the Keystone State, while my friends from Texas [Mr. Reagan and Mr. Mills] can see in it no advantage to the United States. But with all the opposition, based, as I believe, on an erroneous theory that is neither sustained by argument, reason, nor facts, I feel confident that the advantages which will accrue to this Government and people by the passage of this measure. accrue to this Government and people by the passage of this measure will more than convince some of my opposing friends that they are

As a national measure, its advantages have been so ably portrayed by my friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] and others, that I need not dwell upon them. As a measure of deep importance to the people of the Pacific coast and as a military, naval, and commercial necessity, the subject needs more than a passing reference.

As a military necessity, who for a moment can doubt it? Great Britain owns all the islands from Australia to British Columbia expect the Harming Lebe. To dow the introduction to deep the next the second that the second the cept the Hawaiian Isles. To-day she is struggling to defeat the passage of this bill in order to secure reciprocity with these islands. The British minister at Honelulu has endeavored by every means possible to defeat the treaty made with our Government, in order that his nation may secure the last remaining grant of land in the Pacific Oceau. Defeat this bill and in less than sixty days Great Britain will have secured a treaty with those islands, and will then control every naval station from Newfoundland in the east to Victoria in the North Pacific.

The advantage to our Government in securing these islands, in case of war with foreign powers, cannot be overestimated. Should a hostile government secure them, American commerce would be swept hostile government secure them, American commerce would be swept from the Pacific Ocean. There has been read at the Clerk's desk the opinion of General Schofield, one of the ablest of our Army officers. You have heard that opinion, and it is unnecessary to read it again. It comes from one of the greatest military men of the age. It is derived from a personal inspection of those islands, and is entitled to great weight, as are also the opinions of Admiral Porter and other military and payal officers who rank among the first in the service of military and naval officers who rank among the first in the service of the Government. The opinions of these gentlemen are worthy the consideration of the members of this House.

These islands are the Cuba of the Pacific, the key to our commerce, the great half-way house for our trade with Asia; the great naval station or rendezvous for our whaling fleets in the North Pacific. Now is the golden opportunity to secure the prize, which stands ready to come to us, without cost or entangling alliance. Shall we let it slip from our grasp? Shall we deny our people the right to trade with these islanders? Shall we refuse to accept this great and important parallel strips? Shall we allow these islands to be the trade with naval station? Shall we allow these islands, the last group in the Pacific, the key to our oriental commerce, to pass into the hands of a foreign power? I hope not. We carry in American bottoms under the American flag most of the commerce of those islands. Pass this bill, and our American sailors and merchantmen will control the entire trade of these islands.

There must be a commencement in this matter of reciprocity, to be There must be a commencement in this matter of reciprocity, to be followed by similiar treaties with Mexico, Cuba, Canada, and other countries. This is the first step in the right direction. England makes treaties with distant islands with profit to her people, whose commerce extends to all the world. Will gentlemen say that American energy and enterprise are at a discount when compared to that of English subjects? If so, never again say that you are the friends of American seamen, American mechanics, American ship-builders, and American commerces. and American commerce.

Would that I could once more see inscribed upon our banners the good old motto of "Free trade and sailors' rights." I see around me to-day men who were trained under that motto, but who seem to have forgotten the times when our fathers encouraged the growth of American commerce and sought by every measure to advance the interests of our whole country, guarding it with jealous eyes and endeavoring in every way to promote the interests of the people.

I will now notice some of the objections to the bill as urged by those who have spoken on the other side. In the first place, it is claimed by some that the population of the Hawaiian Islands is but forty thousand. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] I believe, made that statement, and it is about as near to the fact as the gentleman has got to the question in any point of attack. I have here the latest report from the islands, which gives the population at 62,995. What is the amount of the national debt of these islands? Only about nineteen cents per capita. And the cost and expense of administering the government of those islands is only $1.05 per capita er annum.

The commerce of these islands, said the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Morrison,] is constantly on the decrease; yet in almost the very next sentence he said that it is on the increase. Then, again, our friend from Texas [Mr. Mills] said that the Eastern and Southern States of this country must regulate the price of sugar. Let me say to him that we of the Pacific coast receive scarcely a pound of southern sugar, but import nearly all the sugars we use from the South Sea

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] denounces this as a "job." If this is a "job," it was advocated by such men as Webster and Clay, and many others of the great statesmen who have lived in days gone by. If this is a "job," it is advocated by the President and by Mr. Secretary Bristow, and it was supported last winter by fifty-one members of the United States Senate, and is now reported to this House by a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. If it is a "job," all the public papers of our country advocate it.

House by a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. If it is a "job," all the public papers of our country advocate it.

And permit me to say to the gentleman right here that if this is a "job," I want him to point out wherein the "job" consists. I am the author of this bill; and if he will give me one scintilla of evidence that it is a "job," I pledge myself to get up and ask unanimous consent to withdraw the proposition. I do not wonder that the gentleman's mental faculties are troubled with visions of "jobs." We seldom see a newspaper that does not report some "job" in some Department of the Government. Take your daily papers for the last six months, and almost every day you will find accounts of peculations, of "jobs," of frauds somewhere in some of the Departments.

"Jobs!" "jobs!" Does the gentleman want to unearth "jobs?" If he does I am ready and willing to extend to him the right hand of fellowship to expose and defeat all "jobs." But I am not willing he shall impute to me the authorship of a "job." If he desires to unearth "jobs" I will assist him so far as I am able to unearth the "Black Friday job," by which the people were plundered; the "Sanborn-contract job," by which our merchants were plundered of hundreds of thousands of dollars; and I will aid in unearthing the "Credit-Mobilier jobs," and the "contract-finance jobs," by which the Government was plundered of hundreds of millions of dollars in bonds. We will investigate the "land-ring job," by which hundreds of thousands of poor settlers have been defrauded of their farms. We will investigate naval "jobs" that have cost us millions of dollars. In 1870 our Navy cost us $21,000,000; in 1874 the cost was $30,000,000.

We will show to the country that the Kearsarge, a vessel which during the war cost the Government $182,000 at the Portsmouth navy-yard, when material and labor were much higher than they are today, was repaired during the present Administration, just before an yard, when material and labor were much higher than they are to-day, was repaired during the present Administration, just before an election, at a cost of $496,122.56, or nearly 175 per cent. more than its original cost.

Now, if the gentleman talks about "jobs," let him join with me in exposing them everywhere, whether they have been committed at the hands of one political party or another. We will expose the "Indianring jobs" as illustrated in the fact that in 1873 our Indian adminisring jobs" as illustrated in the fact that in 1873 our Indian administration cost us a little over $3,000,000, while in 1875 it cost us over $8,000,000. We will aid Postmaster-General Jewell, who is doing a noble work, to break up the "straw-bid" jobs, and thereby save the Government millions of money. We will help honest Ben. Bristow to put down the "crooked-whisky" jobs.

But there is another big "job" known as the high protective tariff; and we will kill that job. We will have a tariff for revenue purposes and we will kill that job. We will have a tariff for revenue purposes only, not to uphold an army of officials who are preying upon the hard earnings of the people; so that when the gentleman's constituents purchase a dollar's worth of goods they shall not pay fifty cents or nearly that to uphold a high protective tariff; but they shall get the full benefit of their dollar. Here is another "job" which overtops all others and which by the passage of this bill, and others which will follow; we have to break year.

I wish to call attention to the Treasury report of 1873, to show some of the "jobs" upheld by this high protective tariff, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, I believe, the peculiar and especial advocate. I feel sensitive on this question when he charges me with being the author of a "job." I wish to call attention to a statement showing the rates of customs duties at various ports during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, tegether with the cost of collecting the same.

These tables show that for every twenty-eight cents paid into the Treasury at these ports we have paid into the pockets of officials seventy odd cents. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania advocate these high protective tariffs and oppose reciprocity treaties with the view of keeping up this state of affairs in our country? Sir, I am surprised that my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Morrison,] the great free-trader of the Prairie State, should oppose a measure that proposes to give us reciprocity, which is a step in the direction of free trade, and which tends, I hope, to abolish these custom-houses in

If find down here in these Treasury reports hundreds of ports where we are paying dollars upon dollars and yet do not collect a cent. Take Frenchman's Bay, in the State of Maine, and this year we collected the enormous sum of §4.40, and it cost §6,624 to collect it. Why is it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the great economist, has not discovered some of these things and attempted to expose and correct them? He does not do so; but when we of the Pacific coast come here and ask for a reciprocity treaty to secure exclusive trade of the Sandwich Islands then he composes us and says there is a "ioh" in it. Sandwich Islands then he opposes us and says there is a "job" in it.

Take Nantucket, Massachusetts, and all down the coast from Maine to Texas, and then from Texas around to Alaska, and we have the same state of affairs. I will not take time to refer specially to each case, but will ask permission to print a portion of the list with my remarks.

But I do wish to call your attention right here to two points further: At Paso del Norte, Texas, we collected the enormous sum of $13.29 at a cost to the tax-payers of this country of $18,960 to collect it. In Alaska, if you please, at the port of Alaska, up in that cold region of the north where white men cannot live, we collected last year the enormous sum of $405.89, costing us nearly $15,000. Collector's salary at that port, $3,306.20; five deputy collectors, $7,205; two inspectors, $2,920; clerk, $390.11; and boatman, $306.91.

Now, is it not time, sir, that we should look after "jobs" in a different direction from that referred to by the geutleman from Pennsylvania ?

Sir, the gentleman has gone on to state, among other things in the speech which he delivered in this House the other day, that a comparison between California and Minnesota was unfavorable to my State. His statements were calculated, unless refuted on this floor, to do the State of California injury, and therefore I propose to make the refutation at this time full and complete.

He stated that my State was retrograding: that the people were

He stated that my State was retrograding; that the people were leaving it; that our population was decreasing; that we were next to bankruptcy. I do not know what object he had in view in making this comparison between Minnesota and California, unless it was ing this comparison between Minnesota and California, unless it was for the purpose of defeating this measure. He alleged that the people of California and of the Pacific States were not progressive, were not enterprising. Let us see how that is. In 1860 he stated that the taxable property of California was $139,654,667, and in 1870 it was $269,644,068. I wish to call the attention of this House particularly to the fact, which will be found in the comptroller's report of the State of California for 1873 and 1875, that the taxable property of California in 1873 was $527,203,982, and 1875 $611,495,197, which does not include for the latter year some hundreds of millions deposited not include for the latter year some hundreds of millions deposited in saving-banks and loaned on mortgages, and which would make the total value of property in 1875 nearly $900,000,000. He also stated that the indebtedness of the State of California ex-

He also stated that the indebtedness of the State of California exceeds that of Minnesota by over $15,000,000. I am astonished the gentleman should make such an allegation, especially when I remember the constitution of California provides that the debt of that State shall never exceed more than $5,000,000. What is the debt of that State of California? I have it right before me, taken from the comptroller's report. The debt of the State of California is $3,654,500, and the debt of the counties in the aggegate $7,780,773.83, making a total of $11,435,273.83. Now what are the assets? We have State property amounting to $8,237,380, and county property valued at $10,704,240, making $18,941,620. This will leave together with the cash in our State and county treasuries ($2,191,892.06) a balance of $9,698,238.83 in our favor. So much for the gentleman's figures.

Why did not the gentleman tell the House that the people of California had more than trebled its taxable property since 1872, and that it is now nearly four times what it was then?

that it is now nearly four times what it was then?

Again, the gentleman says that Minnesota has fewer convicts by fourteen hundred and twenty-six than California. I cannot see how my friend can arrive at his conclusion unless they have no convicts at all in Minnesota, for California has less than the number designated by the gentleman, fourteen hundred and twenty-six.

by the gentleman, fourteen hundred and twenty-six.

He next attacks our public-school system. Let me say that California has the best free-school system in the world. The proceeds accruing from the interest on the public-school fund give free schools in every school district in the State for at least ten months in the year, with a holiday in July and December.

The gentleman then inquires, "Why is she so laggard in the race for civic supremacy." Let me make one comparison: On the Pacific coast in 1874 we built sixty-three steamers and other vessels, and in 1875 seventy-eight. While there was an increase in ship-building on the Pacific, there was a decrease in the Eastern States. Although Pennsylvania has many times the representation of the Pacific States she only built sixty-two vessels, while, as I have stated, on the Pacific coast built sixty-two vessels, while, as I have stated, on the Pacific coast we built seventy-eight last year. Such is the result of a comparison between Pennsylvania and California. Sir, in the name of the people of California I deny that they are laggard or that the State lacks energy. I hurl back the charge and say to the gentleman the people of our State are the most enterprising in the world. California is not laggard in anything which will make her people happy, intelligent, prosperous, and great.

Our public buildings, hotels, private residences, workshops, founderies, and factories are excelled by none. Our public libraries are valued at millions of dollars. Our people are most prosperous. And why? Because our circulating medium is good the world over for all debts, whether due to the Government or individuals. Golden eagles debts, whether due to the Government or individuals. Golden eagles and silver dollars jingle in every man's pocket, and we have no beggars through the length and breadth of my State.

The currency of my State is currency created by God Almighty, and adopted by the children of men as the circulating medium of the world—gold and silver. The gentleman desires to bolster up his ragmoney theory by unfair statements, which are calculated to injure my State. He would have you believe that we are retrograding, that our property is depreciating in value, that our population is leaving us. And, to sum up all, he would have you believe that our people lack energy and enterprise, and that if given the treaty with the Hawaiian government, by reason of our lack of energy it would prove a worthless boon to us. a worthless boon to us.

Sir, we had 70,000 emigrants enter into our State last year. I do not know from what State they came, but my colleague [Mr. WIGGINTON] informs me that a large portion of those emigrants came from Minnesota and quite a number from Pennsylvania.

To show you that we have enterprise, wealth, and prosperity, and that to develop the great resources of my State we must have reciprocity not only with the Hawaiian Islands but with Mexico and all other countries within our reach, I will call your attention to the wealth of my State in another matter, namely, the number of farms in California. I have here the report of the controller to the State heard. California. I have here the report of the controller to the State board of equalization of California for 1873, and there has been a large increase since. I was myself one of the first to turn the soil of California, not by hired labor, but by my own hands. I was one of the first engaged in agriculture in that State, and I expect to live and die a farmer. The gentleman must not misrepresent my State. He perhaps does not do so intentionally, but his statements show that he has been imposed upon from some source or other.

Now, sir, in California we have 23,315 farms, ranging from 100 to 500 acres; over 500 acres and less than 1,000 acres, we have 2,383 farms; more than 1,000 and less than 2,000 acres, 1,126 farms; more than 2,000 acres and less than 3,000, we have 363; over 3,000 and less than 4,000 acres, we have 189; over 4,000 and less than 5,000 acres, we have 104 farms; over 5,000 and less than 10,000 acres, we have 236 farms; over 10,000 and less than 20,000 acres, we have 158 farms; ranging from 20,000 acres upward, we have 122 farms. There is one farm in my district in which there are sown this year 40,000 acres of wheat. On that farm there are several school districts, and there is a school almost in every section, paid for from public funds, with gold and silver coin, if you please.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask you whether you will take the ipse dixit statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the resources of my State and her productions, of her commercial wealth and prosperity, of the soundness of her circulating medium, or will you accept the honest facts and conclusions as shown by our official reports? If the gentleman has fallen into error in one instance, may not his deductions be false in the other?

I hope, sir, I have not trespassed on the time of the House in speaking of the resources of California, because I am proud of my State and proud of my people, and I do not intend that any man shall misrepresentit. I know no mother but California. I went to that State when I was scarcely as large as one of the little pages on this floor, all alone to battle through life without influence to aid me. And, sir, I love that State as I love the recollection of a mother. There are no people in this country that are truer to the Union than the people of California. And, sir, we are the most prosperous people to-day within our whole country's extent.

Need I add that such a matter as the one now before the House has received the sanction of the most eminent and learned American statesmen? Webster, Clay, Polk, Marcy, Seward, Robert J. Walker, McCulloch, and others, have all indorsed it in their day. As far back as in 1840 Webster was willing to resort to war if necessary to prevent Great Britain or any other foreign power from gaining control of those islands. Several of our Secretaries of the Transactive back. trol of those islands. Several of our Secretaries of the Treasury have favored it. Our present Secretary, Mr. Bristow, whom we must regard as one of the ablest and purest officials in the Government service, advocates the measure. I ask the Clerk to read what Mr. Bristow, tow says upon the subject. The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT January 15, 1875.

January 15, 1875.

Sir: In reply to your communication of January 6, transmitting a copy of the draught of a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, I have the honor to submit the following statements as to the present condition of the commerce of the United States with those islands, and also such views and suggestions as you invite in regard to the stipulations of the proposed treaty.

The trade of the United States with the Hawaiian Islands is chiefly in tropical or semi-tropical products, as imported, and in miscellaneous manufactures of the United States, as exported. Its aggregate value is not large. For the year ending June 30, 1873, the total value of the merchandise imported was $1,316,270, and the average for six years ending at the same time was $1,192,984. The exports from the United States to those islands for the single year named were $701.018 in value, the small amount of $30,915 only being of foreign production. This is less than the average for six years, that average being $305,167; of which a small portion only was foreign. Thus in both cases it is shown that the trade in its present condition is stationary, or at least not undergoing material enlargement.

The conditions attending this commerce appear, however, to be such as render it of greater value to the United States, in proportion to its volume, than is usual with countries similarly situated and producing sugar as the leading staple. So far as the exchange of articles is concerned, there is an equivalent to be found in our export trade for the value of the sugar and other articles imported. Such is not the case with most of the tropical islands or sugar-producing countries of either hemisphere. The import trade from the several possessions of the East Indies shows large aggregates received and very small values returned in the produce of the United States. The heavy adverse balance must be paid in coin. Thus the exports of United States produce and manufactures to China are but 5 percent, of the imports from China; and the like exports to the Spanish East Indies, or Manila, are but ½ of 1 per cent, of the imports from those possessions; and finally, the exports to the Dutch East Indies are but 4 per cent, of the imports from the same. The Hawaiian Islands take an aggregate value of American produce and manufactures twice as great as do the last three countries or possessions taken together.

The accompanying statement gives some of the values here cited in compact form or Manila, are but ½ of 1 per cent. of the imports from those possessions; and finally, the exports to the Dutch East Indies are but 4 per cent. of the imports from the same. The Hawaiian Islands take an aggregate value of American produce and manufactures twice as great as do the last three countries or possessions taken together.

The accompanying statement gives some of the values here cited in compact form for reference, and if forcibly illustrates the deficiency of our export trade to the sugar-producing countries of the Pacific other than the Hawaiian Islands.

It is also probable that in the ordinary statements of the commerce of the United States with these islands the values are somewhat too largely stated for the imports, and as much in deficiency for the exports. Such, at least, appears from the official statements of the Hawaiian government, where the imports from the United States for 1873 are placed at $536,522, of which sum $786,522 in value paid duty, and the exports to the United States are stated at $1,088,226. The effect on the revenue of admitting the articles named in the schedule free of duty is, first, to remit the amount levied on the sugar, the quantity of which was, in 1873, (fascal year.) 15,743,146 pounds, on which the duty, at two cents per pound, is $314,833; and, inclusive of a small amount of other saccharine products, (molasses and melado,) it amounts to $320,345, in all, on this class of articles. This is, also, nearly the average for three years ending with 1873. The duty on other articles imported, and included in the schedule of articles to be admitted free, is small in amount, the list including none of conspicuous importances. The aggregate received is now less than $50,000 per year. The entire release of duty proposed by the treaty, therefore, would be nearly $370,000 yearly.

In relation to the question of duty, it is, however, only just to say that the present onsumption of sugar on the Pacific coast is rapidly increasing, the increase each year being nearly equal to th

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I support this measure, Mr. Chairman, if for no other reason than that I believe the future welfare and prosperity of our commerce on the Pacific Ocean demand it. But I have many other reasons for supporting it. While it is a national measure, yet it is to a great extent a measure of more than ordinary importance to the Pacific coast. It will advance the commerce and every other industry of the Pacific coast, and our Pacific possessions. Our mercantile interests at San Francisco, Portland, and other commercial centers demand it. Our mechanics and manufacturers demand it. Our agriculturists demand it as a market for their produce. Our great lumbering interests, extending from Mexico to British Columbia,

All the interests of the Pacific coast demand that we shall secure to them these islands, a market for their surplus products and handi-work, and the people of that coast demand that we shall raise revework, and the people of that coast demand that we shall raise revenues from duties on luxuries, and give to the laboring man and woman cheap coffee, sugar, and tea, free of duty. These articles are necessities used in every household, and should not be taxed. Tax the rich man's bonds, his silks, satins, and broadcloth, but exempt the poor man's sugar, tea, coffee, and salt.

Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] opposes this proposition because it interferes with his idea of high protection. Take, if you please, the case of the sewing-machine, an article used in every household in the land. It cost, according to the reports, from $9 to $14 to manufacture, and that sewing-machine is sold in the market at from $60 to $100. An article which costs only $10 or $14 at the utmost we are compelled to pay for at the rate of ten times its cost. Let us look for a moment at the reports of the London market, and you will find that American sewing-machines are sold in the foreign markets from $20 to $30 each. That is another one of the results of the gentleman's high protective system. How can he, if he is a friend to the poor man and of the laboring men and women of our country, oppose a reciprocity treaty that gives to our people the exclusive trade with these islands? It is the first step toward reciprocity with Mexico, South America, and Canada. I would to-day vote for a treaty with each and all of these countries. Great Britain has made and is making her treaties with all the world; she has acquired the control of all the islands of the sea. Now, if she can do this with profit to her subjects, what is to prevent the enterprising "Yankees," the Americans, from doing the same thing.

Were the Pacific States and Territories a nationality, we would ere this have secured this treaty, and a similar one with Mexico. Our Pacific possessions, comprising all the country between Mexico and the British possessions, embracing thousands of miles of sea-coast, producing the finest cereals, grasses, fruits, and all other agricultural productions, together with their immense mineral wealth, commerce, trade, and manufactures, are an important portion of this Government, and have contributed more than any other section, according to population, (within the last twenty years,) toward the support of the Government. But a few years since, all that country was a vast wilderness. I have seen the time when there was scarcely a habitation throughout the length and breadth of that territory; now that section of our continent has grown to be a mighty empire-all in less than a quarter of a century.

I represent in part, Mr. Speaker, the most enterprising people in the world; a people who know no such word as fail; a people who have braved the dangers of the far West, and followed the sun, as it have braved the dangers of the far West, and followed the sun, as it were, four thousand miles, until we saw it sink down in the bosom of the great Pacific; a people who have enriched the coffers of this nation, and added to the commerce of the world over $1,500,000,000 in the precious metals. We will add to the metallic currency this year at least one hundred millions more. We send annually to the grain markets of the world nearly fifty million bushels of grain. In a few short years we have built up great cities, and manufactories, railroads, and great mining enterprises, such as the world has never seen before. Our valleys have been made to give forth bread, and fruit, and wine for the children of the earth. We went forth as children, we return to you in this centennial year as men; and we point with manly pride to the country we have molded by our energies from a wild and desolate forest to a paradise on earth, to happy and fruitful homes with late forest to a paradise on earth, to happy and fruitful homes with peace and plenty on every side, to cities that rival the oldest settled sections of our common country

We point with pride to our ship-building interests; to our sails that whiten every sea; to our merchants and mechanics, whose energy is known the world over; to the vine-clad homes of our farmers and vine-culturists; to the great establishments of our lumbermen, and to the mines that have revolutionized the world. We love our country with God-like devotion. We love our whole country, and the people thereof; and when your great cities and towns were laid waste, our merchants, miners, mechanics, lumbermen, farmers, and laborers, who to-day demand at your hands this small favor of allowing them to secure the trade and commerce of these islands, contributed to you relief with a noble generosity. Well do I remember how the people of my State contributed to the suffering people of Chambersburgh, Pennsylvania; how they gave their thousands and tens of thousands to the sufferers of Chicago. And yet, with all the enterprise, energy, public spirit, and liberality of the people of the Pacific coast, there are those who would crush it out and deny to us this one measure that costs nothing, and yet is much to us and our interests—the very key to our commercial success.

Well do I recollect that at the last session of Congress, or the session before, the people of Texas appealed to us to appropriate a large sum of money for the purpose of establishing telegraphic communication with the western frontier of that State, so that timely notice might be given of Indian raids and the necessary assistance promptly sent there. If I mistake not, the vote from the Pacific coast was unanimously in its favor. When Louisiana asked for assistance in maintaining its levees, when the people of Alabama asked for bread and meat for the sufferers of the overflowed portion of that State, we voted with unanimity for the necessary appropriation; and I pledge you that no man to-day hailing from the Pacific coast will ever deny to any section of the country one thing needed to promote and advance the common interests of the country, and particularly of the locality seeking aid.

The State of California is capable of sustaining thirty millions of people; Oregon and Washington Territory as many more. Immigration is pouring daily into the States of California, Nevada, Oregon, and the Pacific coast Territories. While our mining interests are daily increasing, our agricultural interests are increasing at a still greater ratio, and we seek an outlet for our daily increasing products. Such an outlet is afforded in the Hawaiian Islands, and in advocating this measure the people of my section look not only to their own advantage, but to those which will also accrue to the entire country. In several of the articles enumerated in the bill before me, the Sandwich Islands cannot compete with us. We can safely admit free of duty vegetables and hides, as it is not probable that with our agricultural sources vegetables will ever enter largely into the importations, or that with our vast leather industries and the skill of our leather-dress ers the leather interest will ever suffer greatly by the free importation

In return for what we shall receive from these islands, the treaty admits of the exportation of almost every article known to trade or commerce, while we receive from them but few articles we cannot produce ourselves. The heavy adverse balance of trade thus created must be paid for by the Hawaiian government in coin, and in the present condition of affairs this is an important advantage. To give cheap sugar and sirup to the laboring classes and to the poor man in return for our iron, our coal, our steel, our cotton fabrics, woolen goods, and other products, is certainly a desideratum and should not be used as an argument against the bill by sugar-refiners who have grown rich on the poor man's pittance.

The productions of the Pacific coast are great and varied, and as bearing on this subject I will briefly recapitulate a few items of the products of my own State, regretting that I have not the data from Oregon, Washington Territory, Idaho, and the great silver State of

The wheat product of California in 1875 was about 40,000,000 bushels, worth between forty and fifty millions of dollars. Of wheat and flour, we exported in 1875 nearly 20,000,000 bushels. In nineteen years we have exported $750,000,000 in gold and silver. The coinage of our mint alone for 1875 was over $32,000,000, and from the time of its organization in 1854 to the close of the last fiscal year it was nearly its organization in 1834 to the close of the last iscal year it was nearly $450,000,000. The value of our merchandise exported by sea in 1875 was over $30,000,000, one-sixtieth of which went to the Hawaiian Islands. The sales of the San Francisco Stock Board of Mining Stocks for 1875 amounted to nearly $225,000,000. The lumber product for 1875 amounted to nearly $225,000,000 The lumber product for 1875 amounted to nearly 45,000,000 pounds, and our wine product to over 10,000,000 gallons, worth $4,000,000. Our quicksilverproduct, yearly increasing, amounted in 1875 to 54,000 flasks. Oursales of real estate amounted to $36,000,000, and to the propulation in that year we added by immigration to the and to the population, in that year, we added, by immigration to the State, 70,000 people. As showing the thrift and economy of our people, we had in 1875 over $72,000,000 deposited in the saving-banks and a banking capital of $150,000,000, and the banks and corporations declared a dividend of nearly $28,000,000.

Can the gentleman from the great State of Pennsylvania say as much for his State? I would not say a word against that gallant old State that is doing so much in this centennial year for the exhibition of the products of our great country. I supported from the beginning to the end the appropriation asked to advance the great improvements that are going on in Philadelphia. I would do it again. I do not regret my vote on that subject. I would repeat it a hundred times. But I regret exceedingly that my friend from Pennsylvania should have fallen into error and misrepresented my State. should have fallen into error and misrepresented my State. I will not believe that he did so intentionally; but nevertheless he has done so, and I am going to hold him to the record. If the gentleman sees fit to repent, I hope he will go to confession, and join either the democratic or republican party. I do not care which, for the Lord knows that he does not know where to find him now. [Laughter.]

Our great railroads across the continent show a tonnage of 1,905,731,-063 pounds on the Central Pacific and 451,854,741 pounds on the Southern Pacific. I present these facts to show the importance to the Southern Pacific. I present these facts to show the importance to the Pacific coast of the passage of this measure; to show too that the gentleman when he spoke of our lack of energy was entirely mistaken; for I speak from the official records of my State.

The trade of the Pacific coast is daily extending and seeks new outlets. Such an outlet is now afforded by the bill now under consideration. And my people ask at your hands that the measure may become a law, and that they, and you, and all the people of our land may reap the advantage that will accrue from the exclusive trade of these islands. An examination of the schedule will show that most these islands. An examination of the schedule will show that most of the advantages to be derived from this treaty will be on the side of our Government, and I sincerely hope that this House will avail itself of the opportunity now presented and accomplish a result which will add to the revenues of the Government and greatly benefit the working classes and manufacturers of the Pacific coast.

To show the popularity of the measure, I need only add that the press of the Pacific coast and of the East are unanimous in its favor, and that the Senate last year ratified the treaty by a vote of 51 to 12 showing that that body was also almost unanimous for the passage of the bill. I append the following statements as showing the trade with the Hawaiian Islands as compared with other countries:

Value of Hawaiian trade as compared with other sugar-countries. Hawaiian Islands export to the United States $1, 139, 725 The islands import from the United States 836,000 Imports over 75 per cent, of exports. Under the treaty would be nearly equal. CUBA. Cuba exports to the United States $77, 469, 826 Cuba imports from the United States 1, 397 729 Imports not 2 per cent. of exports. BRITISH EAST INDIES. British East Indies export to the United States $16,855,747
The same import from the United States 165, 270
Being not 1 per cent. of exports.

SPANISH POSSESSIONS OTHER THAN CUBA.
Other Spanish possessions sell to the United States	$6, 171, 635 17, 570
Less than ‡ of 1 per cent.  DUTCH EAST INDIES.
Dutch East Indies sell to the United States.  The same buy of the United States.  Less than 4 per cent.	$7, 556, 954 255, 134
CHINA.
China sells to the United States The same buys of the United States Being about 7½ per cent.	$26, 353, 291 1, 931, 732

The importation of rice from the Hawaiian Islands for the fiscal year ending June, 1875, was 794 tons, valued at $60,131; which is a small portion of what the Pacific States consumes.

Exports from San Francisco in 1875.
Germany. Hawaiian Islands. South America Japan Other countries British Columbia Mexico	$189, 233 562, 308 498, 604 632, 600 1, 808, 595 961, 588 1, 211, 048
China

In conclusion, I would remark that the immense commercial advantages which would accrue to our Government from the passage of this bill are comparatively insignificant when compared with the great advantages which our Government is to derive from it as an outpost to protect and defend the commerce of the Pacific States. I may add further that the Pacific States are a unit on this subject. They ask, and I demand in their name, the passage of this bill. It is a Pacificcoast measure, and we do not want to have you send us home defeated and mortified. It is a measure which every man, woman, and child from Mexico to British Columbia west of the Rocky Mountains desires to become a law. We ask its passage for the encouragement of commerce on our coast. We ask it in order that we may have an establishment for the protection of our commerce, a great half-way station between the Pacific coast and Asia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WOODWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate was communicated by Mr. SYMPSON, one its clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 386) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory;

A bill (S. No. 504) granting a pension to Nancy True;
A bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders; and A bill (S. No. 40) granting a pension to Elmira E. Cravath.
The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles

A bill (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phæbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan; and The bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling. The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army. United States Army.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the question now pending before this committee is a question not so much between the United States and the kingdom of Hawaii as between the United States and the kingdom of Great Britain. It is a matter of very little consequence to the kingdom of Hawaii whether this treaty is ratified by our Government or not. A similar treaty can be made between that kingdom and Great Britain; and if this treaty is not ratified by our Government, not one year will elapse before such a treaty will be made. It is utterly impossible, in the very nature of things, that Great Britain should not desire the possession of these islands. Is there any place in the wide world that Great Britain does not want? Is any place in the wide world that Great Britain does not want? Is she not anxious to occupy every great highway of commerce in any part of the world which she has not already taken possession of? Has she not already the stronghold that controls the Mediterranean? Has she not Gibraltar and Malta? Has she not the Suez Canal and the city of Aden? Has she not the Cape of Good Hope, which formerly controlled the commerce of the East Indies? Has she not within the last year obtained the Fiji Islands? What spot on the face of the earth is now left that the kingdom of Great Britain should so much desire as these very islands? What sea does she not control already: what part of the navigable world is not already under her already; what part of the navigable world is not already under her

The very fact that these islands are in the middle of the ocean makes them of infinitely more value than if they were adjacent to our own shores. Suppose there was an island half-way between this country and England, on the line of the great commerce between America and Europe, which could be made impregnable; with such an island in our possession, would we not control the commerce of the Atlantic Ocean? With such an island fortified and rendered impregnable, a place into which our vessels could run, would a British sail navigate the North Atlantic except by our consent? Do not these islands occupy the same position in the North Pacific? If they were in the possession of Great Britain—if the port of Honolulu was fortified; if she had the right to send her vessels there to be refitted and provisioned—would she not control for all future time all the companion of the Pacific Companion except of the Pacific Companion exc merce of the Pacific Ocean in case of war? Would any American vessel sail from San Francisco to China or Japan? Not one; not a vessel. If, on the other hand, we had possession of these islands—if the American flag floated over Honolulu, and we could send our vessels there-would a British sail be seen in the North Pacific? Not one. It does not admit of an argument.

It does not admit of argument that Great Britain wants possession of these islands. She is now negotiating for the possession of them. She has looked upon them for years and coveted them, and the only reason why she has not had possession of them at this time is because she has not been able to get possession of them. They are naturally a dependency of the United States. Our citizens reclaimed them from ignorance and barbarism. Our citizens now manage the government of those islands. Scarcely an important office is held to-day except by American citizens. It is substantially a colony of this country. The chief justice, the chancellor, and two side judges constituting the supreme court, the secretary of the treasury, the attorney-general, indeed I may say that substantially the government of that kingdom is in the hands of American citizens to-day. All her sympathies, all her feelings, all her education lead her to look to the United States as to her natural ally. She looks to us for support, for friendship, and in case of danger for protection, and she prefers to make this treaty with us.

She has done all in her power to make this treaty with us. What more can she do? She has negotiated three treaties with us, and this is the last treaty which ever will be negotiated between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States of America. Their patience is exhausted. The time has come when we must receive or reject this treaty. They are not willing any longer to dally in this manner with us. We have made the treaty to suit ourselves. It is our own treaty, negotiated by us, adapted to our wants, molded to suit our wishes. It was negotiated by the proper authorities of the two governments and sent to the Senate of the United States. There it was amended and still further adapted to our wants.

The question is whether we will accept the work of our own hands. If we will not, then, sir, in less than one year from this time another treaty will be negotiated with another power, and that will be the first step to the possession of those islands.

The King of Hawaii sees and all his people see that the time is coming when the autonomy of that government cannot be protected and continued. The time is coming rapidly when they will have to lean upon some power. This treaty is negotiated with reference to such a result. Now the question is whether that power shall be the United States or the Kingdom of Great Britain. Great Britain for generations has marched over the world like a mighty giant, putting her foot one year on a continent and another year on an island, until she has taken possession of most of the inhabitable globe. She controls the whole southern world, from the Cape of Good Hope to the western boundaries of South America. She only wants these islands to control the entire Pacific. She is looking for them.

Now what are the objections which have been urged to this treaty?

Now what are the objections which have been urged to this treaty? They appear to me, Mr. Chairman, to be utterly futile; scarcely worthy of the time necessary to give an answer to them. I will take them up very briefly and state my views in regard to the reasons given by some gentlemen for their vote against this bill.

One point which is made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Morrison,] who spoke against this bill, was that, if these islands were to increase in business and power, it was to be done by means of Chinese immigration, and he wanted no more Chinamen in the country; no more foreigners the gentleman from Texas said. Why do we not more foreigners, the gentleman from Texas said. Why do we not want any more foreigners in this country? Have we come to that period of time?

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allowme, as he unintentionally gives a construction to what I said which is not warranted. My remark was in reference to three classes. I am as much in favor as any one of foreigners coming from European nationalities, but against incorporating into our Government Asiatics, Indians, or Africans, I shall protest. I am not against foreigners. The only connection in which I mentioned other foreigners was that we had to educate all who came here into a knowledge of our system of government.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. If I understood the gentleman, he said that the foreigners coming into the country had been a great strain upon our institutions, and it was desirable we should not have any more of them.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; if the gentleman will allow me—what I stated, if I remember aright, was that the strain put upon our Con-stated, if I remember aright, was that the strain put upon our Constitution was in the enfranchising and giving the right of suffrage to those not qualified to exercise the duties of citizenship.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. It is immaterial, Mr. Chairman. He objects at least to the Chinese population. The point is whether that is any objection. If we want the possession of these islands as outposts to protect the frontier of the Pacific, it makes but little differences by the way of the possession of the property o ence whether they have five thousand or forty thousand Chinese.

When Great Britain wanted possession of Gibraltar, Malta, and Aden she did not inquire what population occupied those places. It was no objection to taking possession of Aden, when she wanted it as an outpost on her way to India, when it was occupied by Arabs and Africans, that they constituted the great bulk of the population. Of what consequence was that? She wanted it merely as a port to which she could take her ships and a fortress where she could defend them.

That is what we want this place for.

Mr. REAGAN. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I were to say one word at this point?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. What I want to call the gentleman's attention to in connection with the remarks he has just submitted is that the English possessions to which he was referring were not incorporated into the body of the English people or made part of English soil to influence the frame and form of the English government, and were simply made. English dependencies, having no power to control the form of gov-

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. That is a question which may come up at the proper time. It is not the question to-day. It is not a question of bringing the Hawaiian Islands into the United States as a component part of this Government. That is a question for future legislators to deal with at the proper time, if it shall arise. Whether that time shall ever come or not is not a question that is before us this day. All that is now before us is the question of a closer alliance between the United States and the kingdom of Hawaii.

If we want those islands on account of their productions, if this treaty is merely a commercial treaty, that is the only point of view in which it is important. And in that point of view of what consequence is it to us whether the sugars which we may receive from there are made by Chinese or are made by the natives of the islands? But it is a sufficient answer to the objection made by the gentleman in regard to the Chinese to say that what few Chinese there are on those islands now have been there for years; that there has been no influx of Chinese population into those islands; and that there never will be such an influx when they can go to California and get two or three times as much wages per month as they can get in the Hawaiian Islands. That is the answer to the objection in regard to the Chinese. They have been there heretofore. They will not go there hereafter, because they will go where they will have a larger amount of wages for their labor.

But it is said, also, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] and I think by some of the other gentlemen who have addressed the committee, that this bill is for the benefit of the sugarplanters on the Hawaiian Islands. Suppose it does benefit the sugarplanters; is that any injury to the United States? What objection is it to the bill that the sugar-planters are to be benefited by it? Are we to suppose that the King of Hawaii is to make a treaty with this country that is not to benefit anybody? Whoever heard of a commercial treaty between two countries one of which was not benefited at all by the treaty? The King of Hawaii knows as well as we do that it benefits the sugar-planters, and there is no reason why it should not benefit them, or why it should not benefit the rice-growers and the growers of oranges or of any other products of the islands. What does it matter to us who are benefited or how much they are benefited, provided the treaty is for the benefit of this country?

The gentleman says they are recreant Americans who have gone there, and whom we are to benefit by this treaty. I ask him are the gentlemen that are building railroads in Peru recreant Americans? Are the gentlemen that have been building railroads in Russia, are the gentlemen that have been building horse-railroads in the various. cities of Europe, are the gentlemen that are conducting the education of Japan recreant Americans? I thought they were the very men of all the men in the world that were giving dignity and character to the American nation. I thought they were the very men we ought to be proud of as Americans, that they were the men who were carrying the civilization and the intelligence of the American people into every part of the world. Yet the gentleman was pleased to call them recreant Americans, and said it was they who were to be benefited recreant Americans, and said it was they who were to be benefited by this treaty.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] objected to this treaty because we should be obliged to fortify the island. The gentleman from Texas will remember that this bill now before the House involves no such consequence. This bill is asked for by the gentlemen from the Pacific coast and by all the inhabitants of that coast on other grounds entirely than that it may at some future time lead to the possession of those islands by the American people and to their fortification. But that is a question to come up hereafter; it does not come up to-day. The gentleman from Texas dwelt upon the poverty of the country. Why, sir, he talks about the country as if it were about to be wound up and handed over to a receiver.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman permit me—

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I do not care to be interrupted so much.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to make a remark, but if the gentleman indicates that it will not be agreeable to him I shall not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] yield to the gentleman from Texas?

ENWORTH] yield to the gentleman from Texas ?
Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Yes, sir.

interruption from the point made by the gentleman to which I wished respond. Mr. HENDEE.

Mr. HENDEE. Then let the gentleman from New York go on.
Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I must resume the floor.
Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will now allow me, I will respond

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will now allow me, I will respond to the point he was making.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I cannot yield. It is a question which has not yet come before the American people or this Congress. It may come in the future; and when that time does come, I have no doubt the American people will think it for their interest to take possession of those islands. We have never objected or felt unhappy because the country which the gentleman [Mr. REAGAN] in part represents has been added to this country or because we have been obliged to erect fortifications on two sides of it—on the ocean and along the from erect fortifications on two sides of it-on the ocean and along the fronerect fortifications on two sides of it—on the ocean and along the frontier of Mexico, or because we were obliged to send armies there to protect the people at a large expense. That has never been a cause of complaint on the part of the American people; and if they think these islands valuable for the purpose of protecting this country against Great Britain, they will get value for what they are obliged to expend in rendering the harbor of Honolulu defensible.

It is objected further that the carrying-trade between these countries is not secured by this treaty. The carrying-trade is already largely in our hands, and the only way it can be kept there is by means of this very treaty. Reject this treaty and you give up the carrying-trade. Reject this treaty and you put the trade of those islands in the hands of Great Britain; she will take the carrying-trade of those islands as she does of all other islands which she controls. Have we the carrying-trade of her West India Islands? Have trols. Have we the carrying-trade of her West India Islands? Have we the carrying-trade of her Pacific possessions? Have we the carrying-trade of any spot on earth which she controls? Not one; and we will not have the carrying-trade of these islands any longer than until she can make a treaty by which she can take it from us.

But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] who first addressed the committee on this bill, objected further that if this treaty was passed there was danger that sugars from other parts of the world would be smuggled into this country; that they would be taken to the Hawaiian Islands, and from there brought into this country. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that one-half of all the treaties that we have made with foreign powers since the organization of the Government have just such provisions as this in regard to the products and manufactures of those countries, and that they have to be identified as the products and manufactures of such countries before they come here? I have before me a volume of treaties, and have looked into some of them; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] who addressed the committee showed us that, in treaties with some twenty or thirty nations, we have clauses in regard to the products and manufactures of those countries, giving them, under certain circumstances, certain priviliges in regard to their introduction into this country.

If there had been found any difficulty in preventing the introduction of products and manufactures other than those provided in those treaties which we have made, it would have been shown during the one hundred years we have been making such treaties down to the present time. But the thing is utterly impossible. Suppose that a ship-load of sugar was brought from Manila to the Hawaiian Isl-

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me—
Mr. LEAVENWORTH. No, sir; I cannot yield.
Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman not allow me to respond to what he has just said?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I cannot yield. It would be utterly impossible for such sugar to be brought into the Sandwich Islands. Every man on the islands would know that the sugar was brought there for no other purpose than to be taken into some port on the American coast free of duty, and it could be brought there for nothing American coast free of duty, and it could be brought there for homing else. Sugar could not be imported from Manila into Honolulu for the purpose of importation into the United States without the officials of the Hawaiian government knowing it. Would they not know it by the packages? Would not experts know it the moment they set their eyes on it? The thing is utterly absurd. Then the gentleman eems further to suppose that the American consuls at Honolulu and other ports in the Sandwich Islands will sign fraudulent invoices that the goods were the products of the Sandwich Islands. He supposes further that the officials at San Francisco or wherever the articles may be taken would be fraudulent officials. Sir, it is utterly absurd to suppose that any sugar would be brought into these islands and then brought into the United States free of duty.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison] sees another objection to this treaty. He objects to the climate of these islands as unfavorable to labor, and says that therefore it is undesirable to hold these relations with a people who are not disposed to work. Sir, gentlemen on the other side have quoted from Mr. Nordhoff quite extensively on this subject, and I have a word here from him which may perhaps throw some light on the subject. He is high authority to gentlemen on the other side, and he says in an article quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley:]

NWORTH] yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. I find that my attention has been diverted by the

There has been no lack of ingenuity, enterprise, or industry among the inhabitants. The government has imported several kinds of trees and plants, as the cinnamon, pepper, allspice, but they have not prospered. Private effort has not been wanting either. But nature does not respond. Sugar and rice are and must, it seems, continue to be the staples of the islands; and the culture of these products will in time be considerably increased.

He might have added, had he known the facts, and he ought to have known the facts, that there is not a country on the face of the whole globe, not a country the climate of which holds out more inducements to labor than the climate of these islands. He ought to have known that in the whole world around you cannot go anywhere where the climate is more delightful or more satisfactory. He ought to have known that the thermometer ranges between 70° and 84° nearly the year round, rarely going below 70° or above 80°; a climate remarkably adapted to the comfort of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make one remark in regard to the allegation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] that this whole thing bears the aspect of a well-defined job.

That charge, sir, has been answered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] but I wish to say that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew one single, solitary fact indicating that this was a job; if he knew a single thing showing any improper action on the part of any member of the House or anybody else, instead of coming here on this floor and calling this a job without giving any evidence why he so called it, he should have taken the proper action to have the guilty men brought to justice and exposed. It comes with a bad grace for him to come in here and charge that a treaty negotiated by the King of the Hawaiian Islands and the officers of the Government of the United States is a job. It implies a very serious charge against the most eminent persons in our Government, and it is utterly impossible that any such thing could exist. It is very derogatory to the gentleman who made the charge unless he based that charge upon some evidence, and thus far he has produced none.

some evidence, and thus far he has produced none.

Sir, there is another part of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] which excites my profound surprise. In his most effective and most solemn manner he called upon this House to vindicate its own honor and protect its own prerogatives in the matter of this treaty. He stated that those prerogatives had been invaded by the negotiation of this treaty. Why, sir, I am astonished that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] should have made a remark of that kind. I should have been delighted to hear the gentleman point out wherein the prerogatives of the House have been invaded, and what part of the treaty it is that invades our rights here. Why, sir, does not the treaty expressly provide that it is never to take effect until the House gives its sanction to a bill like this? Does any gentleman here ask any other protection than that? Treaties have been negotiated in times past and become valid and effect-nal which did not require by their terms the sanction of this House. But here is a treaty guarded so carefully that it cannot go into effect until it has been submitted to the action of the House. Where can he point to any prerogative of this House that has been invaded by this treaty?

The gentleman, when speaking of the importance of our having these islands as an outpost to guard our coast on the Pacific, declared in the most emphatic terms that we never could have war with Great Britain. Never! Never!

I was astonished that a gentleman as well informed as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as familiar with the history of his country, could rise in his place here and say that we could never have war with Great Britain. The history of this country is but one history of difficulties which we have had with Great Britain. There never has been any considerable period of time when we have not had trouble and difficulty on account of negotiations with Great Britain.

and difficulty on account of negotiations with Great Britain.

There is in Great Britain all the elements from which wars spring. Great Britain is our rival now, as she has been in the past and as she will continue to be. She is forever to be our rival. She is not only our rival, but she is our enemy. There is more of envy of our prosperity, of jealousy of our power, of intense hatred of our people and our institutions condensed into that little fragment of the world called England than can be found in all creation besides. The entire world contains no such intensity of hatred of us and our institutions as is contained in Great Britain, or that portion of it called England. Are not these the materials from which wars spring? To show the spirit of Great Britain as manifested toward us in modern times, I ask the Clerk to read a short extract from the London Times in speaking of Captain Wilkes, a distinguished officer of our Navy during the late war. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

He is unfortunately but too faithful a type of the people in whose foul mission he is engaged. He is an ideal Yankee. Swagger and ferocity built upon a foundation of vulgarity and cowardice—these are his characteristics, and these are the most prominent marks by which his countrymen, generally speaking, are known all over the world. To bully the weak, to triumph over the helpless, to trample on every law of country and custom, willfully to violate all the most sacred interests of human nature, to defy as long as danger does not appear, and, as soon as peril shows itself, to sneak aside and run away—these are the virtues of the race which presumes to announce itself as the leader of civilization and the prophet of human progress in these latter days. By Captain Wilkes let the Yankee breed be indeed.

Mr. LEAVENWOTH. I have asked that that be read because just such articles as that filled the columns of nearly every paper in England during the late rebellion. That was the spirit manifested toward as by the British nation; not by every one, but by the governing classes, the nobility, the gentry, and the wealthy people of England. That is the spirit of the nation toward us, and always has been.

This nation was born into existence through British tyranny and British oppression. No sooner had we closed the war in 1783 than we had another war—of diplomacy—with the same British government for fifteen years, in order to obtain possession of the country which we had won by battle and which they had guaranteed to us by treaty. Did not England hold our western frontiers, furnish arms and ammunition to the Indians, and keep possession of our western posts for fifteen years in spite of every effort on the part of our Government to obtain them? That was the first thing after the Revolution; and before we got possession of those posts did not the British government begin to arrest our vessels in their course, to seize our citizens and put them on board of British ships by hundreds and thousands and compel them to fight in their vessels and to sacrifice their lives? For more than fifteen years there was not a year or a month that they did not stop our vessels on the high seas and seize our citizens and oppress them in this manner. They might as well have landed on Roanoke Island or on Long Island and taken the farmer at the plow or the mechanic in the workshop as to take our citizens in vessels on the high seas. Yet we bore for years these outrages and insults from Great Britain.

The whole history of that country down to this time is marked with the same spirit of insult toward us, never more manifest than during the late war between the States. Who built the vessels that destroyed our commerce? Who equipped them and furnished them with arms and ammunition? Who sailed them on their course of devastation? They were built, equipped, and armed in British ports; they were sailed under the British flag and manned largely by British seamen. It was nothing less than the meanest and most contemptible war waged by the government of Great Britain against the Government of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his remarks said that Great Britain did not dare to make war upon us. When the Trent was seized by Captain Wilkes, and four men taken from it, after detaining it a few hours, what did England do? Within twenty-four hours after the news reached Great Britain she ordered 25,000 stand of arms to be sent to Canada. She went into the market and bought Armstrong and Whitworth guns in great quantities. She recalled passenger vessels from their destined courses to take soldiers to Canada. She forbade the exportation of arms and ammunition and saltpeter; and she gave this country just seven days to say whether she should make war upon us or not.

Now, the gentleman speaks in a very grandiloquent style of what we should do in case of a war with Great Britain. He talks of the manner in which we should enter Canada. Well, it is a very easy thing to take Canada on the floor of this House! It is a very easy thing to picture the easy manner in which we would walk into Canada and take possession of Quebec and Montreal. It is not difficult to bring down the patriotic feelings of the House and have them manifested when the picture is drawn to our taste. But it seems to me gentlemen should reflect that we have tried taking Canada twice, and not with any very great amount of glory to the American arms. It might be well enough to be a little modest about taking Canada until we have made some little impression on that country and shown some symptons of our ability to take it. I do not say we could not take Canada; I think it very possible we could; but after the experience of the past and with its history before us, I think it becomes us to be somewhat modest for the present, at least until the experiment has been tried a third time.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in a part of his remarks, ridiculed the idea that we wanted these islands to protect our frontier on the Pacific coast. Said he: "Why do you not, for the same reason, want Ireland? If we take these islands, let us take Ireland, and give liberty to the Irishmen that have fought so many of our battles." The gentleman undertook to show, and I suppose he satisfied himself, that we did not want these islands any more than we wanted Ireland. But he altered his mind before he got through; he changed his tone on this subject, and a little later in his remarks said: "We will give notice to Great Britain that these islands are an outpost of the United States; that we will apply the Monroe doctrine to them, and that she must not touch them." But, sir, is there any gentleman here who supposes for one moment that Great Britain is going to pay any attention to an intimation from us that we do not want her to take possession of those islands? They are substantially offered to us now. This is the third time they have been offered to us. Suppose that we decline to accept of this treaty, which is but an enteringwedge to the final possession of these islands; suppose that we decline to consummate this treaty; do you think that England is not going to make a treaty? And when she has made that treaty and got this commerce in her hands, will she not send her surplus population to those islands, take possession of them, and own them? Now all the influence of the islands is in our favor; it has always been in our favor. They are now the creature of American citizens. But, if we reject this treaty, the time will soon come when they will be as much under the influence of Great Britain; and Great Britain would laugh at our assertion of the idea that she should not take possession of them, and use them for whatever purposes we please; but that Great Britain cannot do the same thing? Great Britain is not sunk so low as to submit to that. She wants those islands; if we will not have them, she will.

Mr. Chairman, reject this treaty, and you plant the colors of Great Britain on every island in the Hawaiian archipelago. Reject this treaty, and you mount British guns on the heights of Honolulu. Reject this treaty, and you give to Great Britain a port which she can fortify and make impregnable, and by which she can drive every American sail out of the North Pacific Ocean. Reject this treaty, and you cede these islands to Great Britain, you renounce all claim to them. If, having them now in your hands, you decline to accept them, you relinquish them to her; and then she will give no attention to your remonstrances. your remonstrances.

Gentlemen, I have nothing further to add on this subject. I think this is the most important matter that has come before the present Congress. I hope that its importance may be impressed upon every member of this committee; that each gentleman may feel that in deciding the question in regard to this treaty he is deciding the other question which is to arise hereafter, whether Great Britain or the United States shall be the owner of these islands.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House at any great length in the discussion of this question. After the able and eloquent argument delivered the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] it would be useless for me to attempt to add anything for the purpose of inducing members of this House to support this bill. It was not my intention to say anything on this subject. Being a representative in part of the State of California upon this floor, I deemed it but proper that other members should take the initiative and urge upon the House the necessity of the passage of this measure.

It might be said by some that, coming from California, having personal interests different or distinct from those of the mass of the people of this country—I say, for fear such a construction might be placed upon what might be said by the Representatives of that State—I was willing and glad to have the Representatives from the other States of this Union advocate the passage of this measure.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] member of the Com-mittee of Ways and Means, has set forth in a very able report to this House, in my judgment, facts sufficient to induce every member of this body to give this bill his cordial and hearty support.

It is urged by some that if you pass this bill and carry this treaty into effect it will be the means of reducing our revenue four or five into effect it will be the means of reducing our revenue four or five hundred thousand dollars. I trust gentlemen will not take that alone into consideration, because this is a mutual treaty, a reciprocity treaty; and, while it admits a few articles, the products of the Hawaiian Islands, free of duty, it also permits the United States to send to these islands products of this country. I find in article second of the schedule agricultural implements, beef, bacon, pork, ham, boots, shoes, grain, flour, meal, and breadstuffs of all kinds, brick, lime, lumber—everything in fact produced in this country, is admitted into the Hawaiian Islands free of duty. That, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, will be sufficient compensation to this Government for any articles admitted by this Government and products of the Hawaiian ticles admitted by this Government and products of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty.

But, sir, I do not propose in the short time I shall address the House to discuss it entirely from that stand-point. I believe, as has been truly remarked by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, it is important not alone to the Pacific coast, but to the people of this country that we should have control of the Hawaiian Islands or have at least relations of amity and commerce with that people. Eventually these islands will fall into the possession either of this country or Great Britain. Is it not important then that we should carry into effect this treaty, that eventually they may fall into the possession of the United States?

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to read briefly from a letter of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, which I do not remember to have seen referred to by any of the gentlemen who have spoken on this question. I quote it from the able report of the committee:

question. I quote it from the able report of the committee:

Opposite the very portals of this commerce and directly in its track lie these islands, keeping as it were watch and ward over us and over this entire coast and its commerce. Plant an active enemy on them and let him fortify himself there, if he were the smallest of the maritime powers he would probably annihilate this commerce. A power with a fleet consisting of only the Florida and the Alabama would, intrenched in these marine fortresses, harass all profit out of it. In the hands of France or England the effect would be to enable either of those powers to shut us out of the great highway of the Pacific and lock us up so far as commerce is concerned within our own mountain ranges absolutely at its pleasure. The United States, by keeping up an enormous naval armament on this coast, could carry her flag with her floating batteries in defiance of such powers and their mid-ocean fortress, but commerce would be suspended; and so important has this commerce of the Pacific become to the United States, so great its present proportions, and so intimately blended with the nation's hopes and interests in its prospective growth, the very knowledge that a hostile power so located could at will destroy it almost without cost, would compel the United States in all international intercourse to take a humbler tone and be less independent in urging its own views, for nations like men intuitively bate their breath in the presence of a power which can if disposed inflict on them a grand injury with small effort.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the sentiment expressed in the letter of

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the sentiment expressed in the letter of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco will be accepted as true by the members of this House. There is no question, in my judgment, but what the interest of the country demands that the people of the United States or the Government of the United States should have control eventually of these islands; but it is also important that we should have commercial relations with them, and that this reciprocity treaty should be carried into effect.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] as well as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] base a portion of their argument at least upon the fact that Hawaiian labor was very cheap, and would be used exclusively in the productions of those islands. By a treaty made by the Government of the United States with the Chinese Empire, for which this House is not responsible, there are to-day on the Pacific coast over 100,000 Chinese, whose labor is used in the production of the beet-sugar referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and whose labor can be secured from lifteen to twenty dollars a month, while they board themselves, which is nearly as low as the price paid for labor in the Hawaiian Islands. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Texas ever objected to bringing these people here under that treaty in large numbers to compete with the workingmen of the United States, at a price so low that no man here can afford to compete with it? Not at all. Then I say, Mr. Chairman, that the objection upon the question of labor falls to the ground.

Now, sir, I contend that, by the adoption of this treaty, it will not affect the sugar production of this country. It is a well-established fact that the people of California and of the Pacific coast can obtain their sugar under the present tariff law of two and a half cents per pound less than they can procure sugar manufactured in the East, from New Orleans or any other portion of the country, as the freight to California would be much greater than from the Hawaiian Islands by two and a half cents per pound. Consequently the carrying into effect of this treaty would not, in my judgment, affect the sugar pro-effect of this treaty would not, in my judgment, affect the sngar production of this portion of the country.

I shall not detain the committee with any further remarks at this time. I did not have the opportunity nor the time, being engaged in committee-work, to prepare any extended remarks on this subject. I have made no preparation at all. I simply desire to state to this House that I believe not only the people on the Pacific coast, but the people of the entire country will approve this bill. If members will examine it before they cast their votes, they will conclude that, as a matter of necessity, as a question of naval importance to the defense of the Pacific coast in time of were it is necessary that we should have of the Pacific coast in time of war, it is necessary that we should have the control of these islands. If we fail to do so now, as was truthfully stated by the gentleman from New York, in less than one year from to-day we shall find it completely under the control of the British government, as has been stated by him.

We now have the carrying trade between San Francisco and the Hawaiian Islands. If we fail to pass this treaty we shall cease to have it. The English government is now awaiting the result of our verdict upon this bill before deciding whether it shall apply to the Hawaiian government for a treaty similar to the one now under con-

Mr. DUNNELL. I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the committee must be anxious that the committee rise; and

bers of the committee must be anxious that the committee rise; and yet desiring to occupy in this debate five or ten minutes, I deem it proper to occupy the time to-night rather than by postponing my remarks to delay a vote upon the bill.

It is true, sir, that this bill has been debated by certain gentlemen who have spoken, in a broad, statesman-like manner. They have taken a broad view of the subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] who opened the debate certainly did justice to himself and the committee which he represents, as also to the gravity of the subject, by the calm, dispassionate, and statesman-like manner in which he presented his views and adduced his arguments in favor of the passage of this bill. sage of this bill.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] to whom allusion has been made, and very naturally, by others who have spoken, departed from his wonted course, his usual style of debate on this floor, and sought to defeat the measure, not by argument, not by facts, not by good reasoning, but by ridicule, and by ridicule alone.

The question what these islands can produce and what is their population or their power of production should not alone be brought into consideration in the discussion of this treaty. Here are these eleven islands, constituting the Hawaiian group and favorably situated in the Pacific Ocean. We are asked to enter into friendly commercial relations with them. We are asked to do so and in such a spirit that it seems to me we shall do the country a wrong if we disregard it.

I think, Mr. Chairman, we may learn something from the policies which have been pursued by the English government with regard to the acquisition of an island here and an island there, in this or that ocean, not because of the size of that island necessarily or its productive powers, but because of its situation upon the map of the globe, its place on this or that water.

It would be a matter of surprise if we could turn to the journals of the English Parliament and find where, in any instance, an English statesman rose in his place and objected to the acquisition of a single acre of territory to the British Crown or where any objection was made to the acquisition or, or friendly intercourse with, any island was made to the acquisition or, or friendly intercourse with, any island any where amid the navigable waters of the globe. That has not been English policy; and many of the small islands over which the English government now has control, that might have been called small, that might have been called unproductive, are to-day the brightest stars in the coronet of English power. England would give up larger portions of her domain elsewhere rather than lose some of the small islands over which to-day she has control. It has always been the policy of that power to protect her commerce. If there was an island anywhere that might be a naval station, a coaling-station, or a halting-station for the English merchant marine or the English naval forces, that government has always been ready to acquire it or enter into friendly relations with it, such commercial relations as this treaty contains.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is our duty, now that the Hawaiian Kingdom seeks these friendly relations, to accept them. It has been well said by the gentleman who has just closed his remarks that the wen said by the gentleman who has just closed his remarks that the English government would not hesitate for an hour, not for an hour, in such a case as this. The tone of the London Times shows very conclusively how these islands are considered by this journal, which so faithfully reflects the will of the government. It would gladly defeat, if possible, the consummation of this treaty between these islands and the United States. I think we may learn wisdom from the course that has been purely by the English has been pursued by the English.

The London Times thus refers to the chief harbor of the islands:

The narrow land-locked inlet or lagoon named Pearl River Harbor is in itself small in absolute extent, but it is of inestimable value to any civilized nation possessing it and using it for naval purposes. In the deep waters of this sheltered lake not only the armed ships of the United States, but of all countries, may find space and perfect security. The maritime power which holds Pearl River Harbor and moors her fleet there holds also the key of the North Pacific.

Now, when we have a harbor like this offered to us for the mere

Now, when we have a harbor like this offered to us for the mere taking, why may we not secure it for our commerce and for our naval force? Admiral Porter recommends it in the strongest terms.

The gentleman from Illinois, who spoke in behalf of the minority of the committee, said that "the policy of annexing these islands to the United States is one full of difficulty." Sir, the policy of annexation is not involved in the ratification of this treaty. We simply enter into relations such as will insure toward us always an active friendship and which we should not treat with contempt. The gentleman also says in the same report: tleman also says in the same report:

No European power should be permitted to obtain the sovereignty of the islands or to gain such influence in them as to menace our security.

Now, let me respectfully ask what there is that shall prevent the consummation of a like treaty between Great Britain and these islands within twelve months, if we shall reject this treaty. Can we say to these islands or to Great Britain that the treaty between them shall not be consummated? It is not our business to say that the proffer has been made to us and we have rejected it. By what authority shall we say that a similar treaty with Great Britain shall not be made? The expressions of the London Times indicate the importance of these islands in the estimation of Great Britain.

therefore, may we not take them in the manner proposed?

It is said that by so doing we will lose a little revenue. That may be true. But the Secretary of the Treasury, in whom the whole country has confidence, says to us that even that loss would be readily made up to us. I confess that I am very often governed by the opinions, discussions, and conclusions of men whom I have been taught to respect and reverence. Daniel Webster and William L. Marcy were educated in different political schools; yet they represented American ability in diplomatic affairs. The broad grasp of those two men is admitted everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land and by all schools of politicians. These men having studied the relations of nations toward each other, having examined into the question of the value of territory, having deliberately considered this whole question, without hesitancy, without questioning, decided that these islands would be of vast value to us. I am willing to confess that the conclusions of these men do influence my judgment, and these two great lights were followed by William H. Seward. Nowhere in our history have there been arguments presented why we may not enter into these friendly relations with these islands.

I have perhaps said enough already. I have no desire at all to make allusions to anything outside of a close view of this case. I regretted that my friend from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who desired to throw the whole weight of his argument and of his position.

sired to throw the whole weight of his argument and of his position upon this floor in behalf of this measure, should have made a mixed speech. I regretted that it should have been a speech in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] upon his currency speech. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania said a month ago in regard to the tariff and in regard to California and Minnesota has no place here in the presentation of arguments why we should adopt this treaty.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] falling back The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] failing back upon reliable statistics and upon the census, certainly a solid foundation, made a comparison touching California and Minnesota which was favorable to Minnesota. I will not attempt to pluck a leaf from the chaplet of California which the gentleman [Mr. LUTTRELL] has so well woven to-day. She is a golden State, indeed. But Minnesota needs no casual, hap-hazard defense of her by me at this time. She cannot be assailed. She is in the census; she is in history; she has her place, and I am not disposed now to defend her in any discussion of this question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment for an explanation?

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not think that Minnesota requires a defense at the hands of the gentleman, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] has said all that could be said in favor of it. I agree with him that Minnesota is a very great State. And in anything I have said I have not attempted by one word to injure the fair reputation of that State or to detract in any respect from its prosperity. What I said was in reply to the representations of the gentle-man about California, which representations were founded in error. What I said also bore directly upon the question now under consid-

Mr. DUNNELL. The report of the majority of the committee cites a sentence or two from the historian of these islands, Mr. Jarvis, who

No trade could prosper or even exist while a hostile power, possessing an active and powerful marine, should send forth its cruisers to prey on commerce.

Now, in order to satisfy myself as to what vote I should give upon this measure, I need only confine my attention to this one single point, and I would vote cheerfully for this bill. If we do not accept this treaty, beyond all question a similar treaty will be accepted by the British government. I know very well how thoroughly the English government seeks to protect her commerce. Such a treaty as this, if made with England, would not exist for thirty days before the harbor of these islands would be entered by English vessels for the purpose of protecting English commerce. And then, whenever there might be a disturbance between this Government and England, all of our large and rapidly-growing Pacific commerce would be put in peril by the existence there of English men-of-war.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that it is our interest to take this friendly hand, to accept the friendship of these islands, and so secure to ourselves all the commercial and national advantages that will re-

I said awhile ago that the English government was always ready to take advantage of any such opportunity presenting itself. That government to-day is not represented simply in her home islands. Her power does not reside merely in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. English power is as majestic far out in many a comparatively small island as it is at home; and this it is that constitutes the mighty power of England, not simply her home power, but her extended dominion. It is manifest in different islands of the oceans, with which she has commercial relations, where she can protect her commerce, where she can carry her armed fleets and obtain coal and provisions.

Suppose that these islands had been in the possession of Great Britain during our late war, how could we then have succored and protected our necessary commerce? Our whale-shipping would have gone into nothingness without the power that we gathered to ourselves in those islands. But when the English government gets possession of them we must bid adieu to them; we must cease to look to them as a resting-place in mid-ocean.

I trust we shall not let ourselves down to the low level of partisanship in the discussion of this question, nor be governed simply by the sordid consideration of a few thousand dollars of revenue. I hope we shall take a broader view; that we shall look at the glory and strength of the Republic as well on the sea as on the land.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect the convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, and had come to no resolution thereon.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that a statement showing the amount of expenditures from appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with different tribes of Sioux Indians, including the Santee Sioux of Nebraska, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ALLEGED CORRUPTION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. LEWIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following reso lution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas CHARLES HAYS, a member of this House, did on the 4th day of March, 1875, nominate one Guy Roosevelt Beardslee for appointment as a cadet of the United States Military Academy from the fourth congressional district of the State of Alabama; and whereas it is reported that said HAYS did falsely certify to the Secretary of War that the said Beardslee had been an actual, bona fade resident of the said district for over two years previous to the nomination aforesaid; and whereas it is extensively reported that the mother of said Beardslee paid to said HAYS the sum of $3,000 to obtain said nomination for her said son; and whereas it is justly due to said HAYS that a thorough investigation should be had in order to ascertain the truth or falsi y of said reports: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the matters aforesaid be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with authority to investigate the same and send for persons and papers.

NEW MADRID LOCATIONS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 100) granting legal titles to the New Madrid locations in the State of Missouri for which patents have not heretofore been issued; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

COMMITTEE-CLERKS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following report from the Committee of Accounts; which was read, considered, and adopted:

At a special meeting of the Committee on Accounts held this morning, the following committees were allowed clerks and compensation fixed:

Committee on Printing, $4 per diem; Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior, $4; and the compensation of the clerk to committee on investigation of Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was also fixed at $4 per diem.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the question discussed so much on yesterday and the day before in reference to the privileges of this House has suggested to me to draw a paper which I have shown to a number of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber as well as on this, and which I think it proper this House should adopt. I ask that it be read and printed, unless it may without objection be considered now. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

In order to settle the limits of jurisdiction over high crimes and misdemeanors charged against any civil officer of the Government of the United States, this House doth declare:

1. That it claims primary and exclusive jurisdiction of impeachment in such cases, and that the criminal jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of justice cannot in any degree, directly or indirectly, interfere with that of this House.

2. That no witness under the orders and no evidence of a documentary character under the control and possession of the House can by the mandate or process of the ordinary courts of justice be released from or taken from such control and possession without a breach of the privileges of this House.

3. Whenever it shall appear by the order of a court or of the judge thereof or by the statement of any legal officer charged with the execution of the laws of the country that witnesses under the orders or documentary evidence under the control and in possession of this House are needful to prevent the escape of or for the arrest and holding for trial or upon the trial of offenders against the laws of the country in the ordinary courts of justice, this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the paramount privileges of this House in respect thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to entertaining the resolution ?

Mr. KASSON. Not if the resolution is introduced for reference only. Mr. LAWRENCE. I would suggest that the gentleman from Virginia add at the end of the resolution the words "except by consent of the House.

Mr. TUCKER. That is already, I think, included in the resolution.

Mr. STONE. I object to debate.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to a privileged question. When the report was submitted to the House by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts I understood the Chair to ask if there was objection. I rose and endeavored to obtain the recognition of the Chair, addressing him in a loud voice, but no notice was taken of it, and no recognition extended to me, the Chair pronouncing the resolution to be adopted without objection. I claim I have the right to be heard on this floor on all questions, and that I am entitled, when I address the Chair respectfully from my place, to be recognized and to be heard in what I may address to the Chair. I have objected to that report, and I still object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia need hardly have the assurance of the Chair that his objection was not heard, nor did the Chair know that he was endeavoring to make objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I addressed the Chair before the gentleman from

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the noise and confusion is the Hall rendered it impossible for the Chair to hear the objection stated, it is not the fault of the Chair.

CHARLES P. WANNALL.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2584) for the relief of Charles P. Wannall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ANDREW J. BARRETT.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. Adams for one week on account of the death of a relative.

And then, on motion of Mr. STONE, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, relating to cotton culture in the States; which, on motion of Mr. Davis, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed ..

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an increase of mail service from Durand to Pepin, Pepin County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of S. S. Irwin and 119 others, praying Congress to repeal the resumption act and issue interchange-able bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Finance. Mr. WINDOM presented a memorial of 552 citizens of Winnebago County, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to complete the Fox River improvement and for the construction of a canal along the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the third plan proposed by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, remonstrating against any change in the present law of Congress requiring a draw to be provided for in every bridge to be hereafter built over the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, remonstrating against an extension of patents on Wilson's patent on feed-motion and similar patents on sewing-machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas parties are asking Congress for a third term of seven years' extension of the patent on what is known as "Wilson's patent on feed-motion," used by Wheeler & Wilson, Singer, and other manufacturers of sewing-machines, the grant of which will place an oppressive monopoly of the same in the hands of such parties and maintain the high prices of such machines unnecessarily: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Iowa, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to oppose and use all honorable means to prevent the extension of such patents and all other similar patents on such machines, so far as the same may be done in justice to inventors and for the best interests of the people.

Approved March 4, 1876.

Mr. WEST. I present the petition of Messrs. E. & B. Jacobs, and quite a number of other citizens of Louisiana doing business in Shreveport, praying the Senate to adopt the House bill repealing the bankrupt act. Although the petition is addressed to me personally, I believe the usage is to admit such petitions. I therefore present it, and move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route, and ordering service thereon, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, by way of the town of Varyville and the Summit Lake Valley, to Lake City, in the State of California; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

tee on Post-Offices and Post-Koads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from the town of Susanville, by the way of Horse Lake Valley and the south fork of Pit River, and Dorris's bridge, and Davis Creek, to Willow Ranch, in the State of California; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CRACIN presented resolutions of the Post-off Tracks of California.

Mr. CRAGIN presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Concord, New Hampshire, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of J. M. Langston, John F. Cook, and others, praying that a holiday may be allowed employés in the Government Departments on April 14, 1876, to enable them to attend the ceremony of inaugurating the unveiling of a monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln in Lincoln Park; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of John Reid, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for compensation for military supplies furnished the United States in July, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 578) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Roberts and Noah Roberts, children of Martin Roberts, deceased, praying the passage of an act referring their claim for pay for services rendered by Martin Roberts during the revolutionary war to the Court of Claims for adjudication, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

IOWA DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I report from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (S. No. 486) fixing the times and places for holding certain terms of the district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa, being the same bill that I reported on yesterday morning, which went over under the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] That Senator is not present this morning, but I am authorized to state that upon examination of the subject he withdraws any objection to the bill. I ask the Senate to proceed to its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for holding the terms of the district courts of the United States for the district of Iowa, in the southern division, at Keokuk on the third Tuesday of January, and at Burlington on the third Tuesday of June, in each year.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to add at the end of the first section the following

Provided, That the United States shall not be at any expense nor in any manner liable for the use of a building or room for holding said courts at Burlington, nor for fitting up the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL COOPER, JR.

Mr. EDMUNDS, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia, to report the same without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration, because there are special circumstances relating to the occupations of this gentleman, which are very creditable to him, that make it desirable, for his sake, that the bill should be passed now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds majority.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the board of trustees of the Girls' Reform School of the District of Columbia have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files of the Senate

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following orders:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Lavinia Mize's claim for bounty be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Ordered. That the papers in the case of Mrs. Louisa Kitchen's claim for a pension betaken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask if there has been an adverse report in either of those cases?

Mr. SPENCER. I am not positive, but my understanding is that there have been none.

Mr. DAVIS. According to the rule, where there has been an adverse report, copies must be left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be observed. These are simply withdrawals for reference to appropriate committees, and not absolute withdrawals. Mr. DAVIS. Of course I understand that the motion is to refer to the proper committees, but when there have been adverse reports I have always thought it was the duty of the Senator making the motion to so state to the Senate. I say this without any reference to these cases or to any particular Senator. As is known, I have served for several years on the Claims Committee, and I know that the same case has been referred to the committee two or three times, and given the committee great work when it was unnecessary; and I have heard frequently Senators ask for the reference of a case which had perhaps been examined upon that very session or the session before. I speak in the interest of Senators on the Claims Committee, who have a great deal of work to do. I know from personal experience that very often the Senator asking the withdrawal from the files himself does not know whether or not the claims have been previously examined. I think it would be well, if we have a rule, for the Chair always to enforce it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the Senator the Chair will observe that the Secretary is very careful that in every case where there is an adverse report the papers are not sent. Sometimes in the hurry of business Senators do not state whether there has been an adverse report or not, but the Secretary understands it and follows the rule strictly. The Chair is very glad that the Senator from West Virginia has noticed this matter, as Senators will now be reminded of

Mr. SPENCER. I think there has been no adverse report in either of these cases. I am not positive about it, however. They are a couple of small cases from Alabama introduced last year late in the session, and I think the committee did not act upon them. One is a pension case and the other is a bounty case.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Alabama will understand, I hope, that I said I had no reference to the cases of any particular Senator or to the Chair. I know the Chair tries to do his full duty always; but I thought nevertheless it would be well to call the attention of Senators generally to the matter involved in these applications. Mr. WRIGHT. As the subject is before the Senate, while I do not know anything about the circumstances of these particular cases, my attention not having been directed to them at the time, I am very glad the Senator from West Virginia called attention to the general question. Do I understand from the Chair that the rule of the Secretary is not to send to the committee any case upon which there has been an adverse report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless a case wher there is new evidence

Mr. WRIGHT. That would devolve upon the Secretary the duty of examining the record and ascertaining that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is always done. Mr. WRIGHT. With that understanding, then, I shall content myself, when an application of this kind is made, without making an objection in any particular case, assuming that the Secretary will attend to the duty. The duty is an onerous one, and if he attends to it he of course relieves us from a great deal of labor. With that understanding, when an application is made I shall not make any objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the usual practice in making the motion is to add a proviso "provided there has been no adverse report." Of course the order would be obeyed, and if that was not appended to the order the papers would be returned whether there had or had not been an adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that it is sometimes stated by the Senator asking the withdrawal that he is uncertain whether there has been an adverse report, and in this case, and in all cases in fact, the Secretary examines the case, and if there has been an adverse report the papers are

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know it is usual to make the motion with such conditions, but unless such conditions are made at the time of making the motion I do not understand it to be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to make that examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the motion is real-and a relative process.

is made under the rule.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the practice of the Secretary, under Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the practice of the Secretary, under the rule, to be that if a reference is asked, unless there be new evi-dence, if there be an adverse report he does not send the papers. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the practice. The orders offered by the Senator from Alabama will be agreed to, if there is no

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) to protect witnesses who shall be required

A bill (H. R. No. 2583) to provide for holding of terms of the district and circuit court of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana;
A bill (H. R. No. 2581) to amend section 3887 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2582) to regulate the removal of causes from State to United States courts.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The bill was reported by the Committee on Territories with amend-

The first amendment was in section 4, line 13, after the words "Constitution of the United States," to strike out "and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.'

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

Sec. 15. That when the State of New Mexico shall be admitted into the Union, according to the provisions of this act, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and said State shall constitute one judicial district, to be called the district of New Mexico; and for said district a district judge and a marshal and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties provided by law for similar officers in the other States, except as herein otherwise provided; and said district of New Mexico shall be attached to, and constitute a part of, the eighth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court for said district shall be held at Santa Fé, in said State, on the first Tuesday of March and on the first Tuesday of October in each year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 16 the following:

SEC. 16. That the circuit and district courts for the district of New Mexico, and the judges thereof respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as section 17 the following:

SEC. 17. That the district judge appointed for the district of New Mexico shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 a year, payable in four equal installments on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 18 the following:

The next amendment was to insert as section 18 the following:

SEC. 18. That the marshal, district attorney, and the clerk of the circuit and district courts of said district of New Mexico, and all other officers and per sons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties by the laws of the United States, excepting such provisions thereof as are specially applicable to some particular officer or district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 19 the following:

SEC. 19. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, or that may hereafter be lawfully prosecuted from said court, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the remand of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district ourt of the district of New Mexico, or to the supreme court of the State of New Mexico, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last-mentioned courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 20 the following: SEC. 20. That from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of New Mexico prior to its admission as a State, the parties to such judgments shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 21 the following:

SEC. 21. That until the judge for said district of New Mexico shall be duly ap pointed, the district judge of the United States for the district of Kansas shall act as the district judge of the district of New Mexico, and shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers in the district hereby created as he has in the district of Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 22 the following:

The next amendment was to insert as section 22 the following:

SEC. 22. That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of New Mexico at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had said courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts respectively shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and all the files, records, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment. In section 20, line 2, after the words "court of" I move to insert the words "the Territory of;" so as to read "the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico." It is to correct a verbal omission.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. After line 16 of section 15, I move to add:

And one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the end of section 14, I move to add:

And that the two sections of land in each township herein granted for the support of common schools shall be disposed of only at public sale, and at a price not less than $2.50 per acre, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which shall be expended in the support of common schools.

This was omitted by mistake in drawing the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Morrill, of Vermont. Mr. President, certainly the consideration of a bill for the admission of a State is one of grave importance. There are some facts which I should like to have discussed, in relation to this bill, in order that we may have something to justify our votes in favor of it if such votes shall be given. I suppose that the bill is to pass, and pass without any great amount of dissent; but it seems to me manifestly proper that there should be a clear and distinct and order and a state of the state of t distinct understanding as to the grounds upon which this bill is urged.

I know very well that under the treaty with Mexico this Territory was in due time to be incorporated into the Union as a State; but, as I read the article of the treaty in this case, it was to be done at the proper time and as Congress might judge fit and expedient. Now I take it that this Territory has no claims to be introduced into the Union unless they are similar to those which would operate in the case of the Territory of Washington or Dakota or any other Territory that we have. Unless the public interests will be promoted by it, it seems to me plain that that Territory ought not to be admitted as a State. In order to solve the question whether it should be admitted or not, we are entitled to know something about the number of inhabitants there now, and the kind of inhabitants, how many of them are of the Anglo-Saxon race and how many of the mixed races, and whether there is a sufficient amount of wealth to support a State government.

Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the admission of this Territory into the Union as a State, but I rise for the purpose of having my doubts solved as to whether it is my duty or not to vote for the admission of the Territory. The policy, as I have understood it to be heretofore, has been that no Territory should be admitted until it had the requisite population for at least one Representative in the other House before it should be entitled to two members in this body. I suppose that unquestionably the chairman of the Committee on Tersuppose that unquestionably the chairman of the Committee on Territories is armed with facts upon all these points. I confess that I have hesitated heretofore as to whether it was my duty to vote for the admission of New Mexico. I have some distrust, I confess, of the Mexican people, as to whether they are capable and competent to sustain a republican form of government. As I have understood in relation to these people in New Mexico, a large share of them are identically of the same character as those in Mexico.

cally of the same character as those in Mexico.

Under these circumstances it has been a question with me whether we ought not to wait until there had a sufficient number of the Anglo-Saxon race emigrated to and settled in New Mexico to make it safe, saken race emigrated to and settled if New Mexico to make it safe, proper, and expedient for us to admit it into the Union as a State. I shall be very glad to be convinced and to have all my doubts solved in relation to this question. It seems to me a matter altogether too grave to pass over here without any Senators paying the slightest attention to the question whether it will contribute to the public welfors on the tadjut this Tomitory and State.

fare or not to admit this Territory as a State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a bill similar in its main provisions to the one now under consideration received a large majority visions to the one now under consideration received a large majority of the votes of both Houses of Congress toward the close of the last session, and after full discussion. I presume therefore that this bill will not provoke any extended debate.

Of course the proposition, as the honorable Senator from Vermont says, is an important one. It is a proposition to endow the people of a Territory with sovereignty, to found an empire, to organize a government destined as we trust to continue and strengthen and grow powerful during the long years of a prosperous future; and more, it is a proposition to give to that government a proportionate power in controlling the destinies of the thirty-seven other independent sovereignties now members of the American Union. Such a proposition should, of course, receive careful consideration at the hands of the American Congress. American Congress

There are, as the honorable Senator has said, two points of inquiry There are, as the honorable Senator has said, two points of inquiry naturally suggesting themselves to the mind in considering the propriety and wisdom of this measure—one in regard to the number and character of the population which we propose by this bill to endow with American citizenship, and the other in regard to the extent, character, and resources of the country which they inhabit, and which it is proposed by this bill to make an independent State.

In regard to the number of population, I believe it is clear that New Mexico has to-day a sufficient population to entitle her, under the law to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle on the law to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle the law to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle the law to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle the law to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle the law to admission as a State as sufficient population to entitle the law to the law to admission as a State as sufficient population to entitle the law to the law

New Mexico has to-day a sufficient population to entitle her, under the law, to admission as a State—a sufficient population to entitle her to a Representative on the floor of the other branch of Congress. In 1850 the population of New Mexico was by the census about sixty-one thousand; I do not remember the exact hundreds. In 1860 the population, by the decennial census, was about ninety-three thousand. In 1870 the population by the census was about ninety-one thousand four hundred; showing apparently a diminution of population of sixteen hundred since 1860; but during that decade Arizona was cut off from the territorial limits of New Mexico with a population of about nine thousand, and the northern counties of New Mexico tion of about nine thousand, and the northern counties of New Mexico were attached to the Territory of Colorado, with a population of about fifteen thousand; showing that, in spite of that loss, New Mexico with her present boundaries, by her natural increase, had almost the same number as she had ten years before with these counties and Arizona then a portion of her territory.

Since 1870, the increase of population in New Mexico has been unprecedentedly rapid. Two reasons are well known, in the western country at least, for that increase. One is that the Indians there have been peaceable; and the other is that there are several railroads which have made rapid progress, all pointing in the direction of New Mexico, and therefore that Territory, before that inaccessible and distant, has been rendered very much more accessible. From the best data the committee could obtain, we believe that the population of New Mexico to-day is from one hundred and thirty thousand to one hundred and sixty thousand; that of that population from thirty-five thousand to forty-five thousand are Americans. The character five thousand to forty-five thousand are Americans. The character of the residue of the population, being of Spanish descent, of course differs in many respects; and we are apt to consider it a less desirable population in many respects than the native-born American population. But it is a peaceful, conservative, law-abiding people; and the committee believe that it is an element which, when mixed with the more adventurous, more enterprising, and bolder border American population now rapidly pouring in, will constitute an excellent element in the formation of the character of the future citizens of the new State.

Then, in regard to territory, New Mexico stretches from about the Then, in regard to territory, New Mexico stretches from about the thirty-first parallel to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, and from the one hundred and third meridian to the one hundred and ninth meridian of longitude west of Greenwich. It contains an area of more than one hundred and twenty thousand square miles—an empire in itself, one hundred times larger than some of the States of this Union, as large as all New England and New York, and twice as large as old England. Of course a large portion of the soil is not rich in agricultural products. The larger portion of the soil consists of a dry, high, and in many places arid plain; but these plains are rich in grazing facilities, capable of supporting vast herds and flocks of sheep, and the valleys of the streams and rivers are rich in agricultural products, while the mountains and the canons are rich in mineral wealth.

The committee, therefore, believe that, independent of any treaty obligations, to which the honorable Senator has alluded, and which were twenty-five years ago sufficiently important to induce some of the most prominent statesmen of this country to favor the admission of New Mexico then, New Mexico, from the number of her people and the extent and character of her territory, is justly entitled to become now a member of this American nation.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, New Mexico passed under the jurisdiction of the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, February, 1848. It was taken possession of by the United States Army during the Mexican war, and a government was established by the unilitary commander.

Under this form of government the people of New Mexico lived until it was organized under a territorial government by act of Congress approved September 9, 1850—more than a quarter of a century

AREA.

The area of New Mexico is 121,201 square miles, equal to 77,000,000 acres, larger than that of most States in the Union.

POPULATION.

The population of New Mexico in 1850, as shown by the census of that year, the first taken after its acquisition, was 61,547. The census of 1860 shows the population that year to have increased to 93,516, an increase of more than 50 per cent. during that decade. The census of 1870 shows the population that year to have been 91,874, but it should be borne in mind that between the taking of the census of 1860 and that of 1870 the Territories of Arizone and Colored by the central taken of the census of 1860 and that of 1870 the Territories of Arizone and Colored by the central taken of the census of 1860 and that of 1870 the Territories of Arizone and Colored by the central taken of the census of 1860 and that of 1870 the Territories of Arizone and Colored by the central taken after the central taken after the central taken after its acquisition, was 61,547. The census of 1860 and the central taken after its acquisition, was 61,547. The census of 1860 and the central taken after its acquisition, was 61,547. The census of 1860 and the central taken after its acquisition and the central taken after its acquisition that year to have been 91,874, but it should be borne in mind that between the taking of the census of 1860 and the central taken acquisition and taken acquisition acquisi 1860 and that of 1870 the Territories of Arizona and Colorado had been organized with territorial governments. The Territory of Arizona was made of the Gadsden purchase, south of the Gila River, and of territory taken from New Mexico lying north of that river. The population of New Mexico was thus reduced about 9,000. The northern tier of the counties of New Mexico was added to Colorado, and thus a loss of about 15,000 was sustained by New Mexico, and from the two causes named New Mexico had 24,000 of her Mexico, and from the two causes named New Mexico had 24,000 of her population taken and transferred to the newly organized Territories of Arizona and Colorado in the decade between 1860 and 1870; and hence the apparent falling off in population as shown by the census of 1870, compared with that of 1860, is accounted for. But estimating the increase at the ratio, 50 per cent., shown between 1850 and 1860, before any of her territory had been taken off, we have for the last five years an increase of 22,968, which, added to the number shown by the census of 1870, (91,874.) makes the population at the beginning of the present year 114,842. Of this number my information is, about 40,000 of the number are Anglo-Saxon and European immigrants. It is claimed, and with great show of correctness, by the Legislature of New Mexico, that her present population is between 135,000 and 145,000. This last figure covers the Pueblos or village Indians, who live in communities, keep the peace, obey the law, and farm for a living. They were engaged in such pursuits at the acquisition of New Mexico, were, as I believe, citizens under the Mexican laws, and it is claimed have been recognized as such by two decisions of the territorial supreme court of New Mexico, the correctness of which is now pending by appeal before the Supreme Court of the United States. I think the claim to a larger increase during the last five years than at the ratio of 50 per cent. per decade is well founded. The Indian wars that cursed that Territory formerly had altogether ceased before 1870. Many large stock, raisers with their numerous employs have settled cursed that Territory formerly had altogether ceased before 1870. Many large stock-raisers with their numerous employés have settled there within the last five years, and many others have gone there in anticipation of railroads approaching that Territory. It is a well known fact that desirable new countries accessible by rail are peopled much more rapidly than the old States were, which did not, in settlement anisor these facilities. ment, enjoy these facilities.

RESOURCES.

I believe the Territory has ample resources to conduct successfully a State government. It began to be settled more than two hundred years State government. It began to be settled more than two hundred years ago, and it contains a number of men of large wealth. It is comparatively out of debt, owing but about $75,000. Its counties and towns are free from subsidies to railway companies and other corporations. Its valleys are fertile, producing by irrigation abundantly all the cereals, as well as vegetables and the grape. It is unusually well adapted to wheat. Its grazing capacity is unsurpassed. The grass is of superior quality, the climate suited to stock raising on a large scale, and water is abundant. Her resources from the sale of wool and hides, and from the cattle shipped, added to those sold to the Army and for the Indians, aggregate about $4,000,000 per annum, and Army and for the Indians, aggregate about $4,000,000 per annum, and the annual yield of gold, silver, and copper is about $2,000,000. Besides these resources, New Mexico has inexhaustible fields of coal and

EDUCATION.

New Mexico is fully alive to the priceless blessing of education, and as evidence thereof the Legislature in 1871 passed an act establishing a common-school system, setting apart to that use the poll-tax and one-fourth of all other taxes.

RAILWAYS.

Several railways partially constructed point toward New Mexico. Should those roads, or any of them, be built, the effect on the copper, silver, and gold interest will at once be felt, and a new impetus given to immigration and the productive industries.

It is insisted by these people, and I think the record bears them out, that General S. W. Kearny, of the United States Army, who took formal military possession of New Mexico in August, 1846, was himself of opinion that the Territory would at an early day be organized under a territorial form of government, to be soon thereafter admitted as a State into the Union. It is entirely clear that this was the policy of President Taylor.

The rule in the admission of new States into the Union has not The rule in the admission of new States into the Union has not been that such States should have a population equal to the ratio established for one Representative. Other things have been taken into the account, as the resources of the proposed State, the character of its population, and its capacity for self-government. Nevada and Nebraska were admitted with populations less than the ratio fixed for one Representative, and Colorado, now preparing to become a State of the Union, has a less population than New Mexico.

In view of all the facts—of the resources of New Mexico present and prospective; of the peaceful, law-abiding character of its citizens; of its possession of a population ample in number to conduct a zens; of its possession of a population ample in number to conduct a State government, and of its long probation under a territorial government—I, as a member of the Committee on Territories, came to the conclusion, after investigation, that New Mexico had good reason for ther prayer to be admitted as a State of the Union; and I believe the time has come when the United States can well be freed of the burden and heavy expense of a territorial government over that people, and will be fully justified in admitting New Mexico as a State when it presents a constitution republican in form and consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I perceive by the explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Territories that he must have mainly relied on the memorial of the Legislature in 1874 as to the facts in regard to the present population of New Mexico. By this memorial it would seem, when we come to analyze it, that it will not bear the construction given, that there is so large a population as is represented. They only claim that there has been an increase of twenty thousand since the census of 1870. That would make the population about one hundred and ten thousand. This memorial was lated in 1874. It is hardly possible that the inhabitants of the Terridated in 1874. It is hardly possible that the inhabitants of the Terri-tory could have so largely increased within the last two years.

Then, again, I notice that in this memorial it is claimed that there were many people—ten thousand—living in the mining districts on the border of the Territory who could not have been enumerated in con-sequence of the great danger and risk in going there to take the cen-

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the honorable Senator allow me to correct his statement there?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to say but a word or two more, and then I will give the Senator the floor. Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me clear when you come to take the parts of this memorial and compare them with the aggregate represented, that there must be some mistake about it; that there is not so large a number as is represented; nor do I understand upon what authority the chairman represents the number of the Anglo-Saxon race there as being at the present time forty thousand.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will allow me, as I made that statement myself also, I will say that the statement is embodied in the resolution of the territorial Legislature of New Mexico.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand that it comes here in the memorial, and that is the only authority for it. That was the very fact I was stating. I do not understand that that agrees with the opinions of travelers who have been there heretofore. The number is very much less

Then, again, as to the character of these men that are Anglo-Saxons who are there. I do not know how much respect they are entitled to. I suppose that they have been mainly the camp-followers who have followed our Army and have been left there, Indian traders, Army

Mr. President, I do not wish to say anything derogatory of the people of the Territory of New Mexico. I shall be quite ready and willing that they shall be admitted as a State if it is the judgment of the Senate, upon a fair consideration of the facts, that they ought to be so admitted; but I think it ought to be clearly understood, and un-derstood upon facts well ascertained, before we take upon ourselves the burden of introducing it into the Union a State with equal co-ordinate powers with each of the other States. It seems to me that it is a question of rather larger importance than those that we are in the habit of considering in the morning hour, and therefore that ought to be subjected to a scrutiny a little graver than a bill for a pension or for relieving the disabilities of any man. I only desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Territories to some of these facts.

Then, again, as to the resources of the Territory, I do not myself pretend to understand how much of the Territory will be capable of culture as an agricultural country. According to the statement of the chairman—and I think he is mistaken in that—it is twice as large as New England and New York.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, sir; I said larger than New England and New York

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Even if it is no more than he now states, if it is really an agricultural country that can be largely cultivated, then it is too large to be admitted as a single State; it ought to be divided; but if it is a State only a small portion of which is capable of culture as an agricultural State, then perhaps it is not too

There are some of these questions that are certainly worthy of consideration, and I merely suggest them.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state in regard to the agricultural resources that it is true of all that section of country that the agricultural area is limited to the valleys, and it is made susceptible of production by irrigation. As I stated before, in their valleys in New Mexico they produce all the cereals; outside of those it is a grazing and mining country.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe the morning hour has expired, and the bill has come up regularly as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour expired, and this bill is the regular business before the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. So I understood; that is to say, this is the unfinished business, and the morning hour having expired, we are regularly proceeding, and deliberately, to determine whether the bill shall be passed, and New Mexico be allowed to take a place in the Union as a State. My friend from Vermont had an idea that we were endeavoring to pass an important bill in the morning hour. would be ample precedent for that if it were so. Many of the most important bills which we pass are considered in the morning hour; and if there be time to consider them, and no Senator is shut off from expressing his opinion, there would seem to be no objection to that stem, for during the morning hour Senators are more in their seats than at any other time of the day except late when they come in to vote for an adjournment. I am sorry this important bill does not keep more Senators in their seats at the present time.

The Senator from Vermont seemed to think that the population of

The Senator from Vermont seemed to think that the population of New Mexico, so far as the Americans are concerned, might possibly be made up of mere camp-followers, those who went to that Territory following our armies. I presume that the remark was confined simply to New Mexico, and had no reference to other of the Territories. The Senator assents. If that is so, I hardly know on what facts such a judgment can be formed. The Territory of New Mexico has not been particularly traversed by our armies, though we have had a small force there. So far as I know individuals who have emigrated to New Mexico they are very excellent neonle. I know quite a number of Mexico, they are very excellent people. I know quite a number of men who have gone there and gone into business. I have a letter before me written by the governor of the Territory, who is a gentleman from Ohio, well known to us all, in which he gives reasons why the Territory should be admitted. Among other things he speaks of an excellent American population. He names three counties, the titles of the counties being somewhat significant of the tone of sentiment in them, as being entirely and thoroughly American—the counties of Grant, Lincoln, and Colfax. My impressions from reading this letter of Governor Axtell, who is there on the ground, is that so far as the Americans are concerned, it is a most excellent population; and he refers also to the character of the Mexican population. The session of the Legislature had just adjourned, the first once since he had been governor of the Territory; he had been there somewhat over a year, and he had an opportunity to observe this class of people as legislators, and he says with reference to them:

The native Mexicans in the Legislature show a good deal of aptness for legislation. As a class they seem to be very obedient to constituted authority, and also very economical, are careful not to go into debt, and scrupulously just in paying their debts.

This seems to be the tribute of this gentleman to the native population, and he certainly is a man of discretion, of considerable congressional experience, and had no reason to misrepresent any facts he saw, or lack of opportunity to know whereof he spoke. The people of New Mexico, so far as the American element is concerned, I suppose is the same as that of all the Territories. They came from Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, and from the different Southern States, carrying with them their old ideas, adventurous it may be, but as a class certainly respectable, worthy of commendation for their enterprise, and they have been very successful in founding new States. Ever since the first one was admitted after the adoption of the Federal Constitution it has been the American system, and it has vindicated itself in its operation. It is the manner in which we have added State after State to the Union. These people feeling crowded in their old quarters, in their old States, finding sterile mountains in Vermont. and few agricultural valleys, finding fierce competition for employment perhaps in New York, finding disadvantages of want of elbowroom elsewhere, have gone out and gradually added to their numbers until they have knocked at the door of Congress, and come in, and become stable States and prosperous communities. This is the system continually going on.

I do not know why, after we have made a treaty with Mexico that
New Mexico should be received, of course within our own discretion as to the time, that we should draw a distinction between the hardy Americans who go out into these Territories and the people of the race with whom we made the original compact that they should come in. With the Mexicans we agreed that this portion of their territory should come in as a State—I admit in our own time. They had in view these very Mexicans that are referred to, this native Mexican population. They are the people they proposed to protect, not our own citizens who might thereafter go to New Mexico, but the original population, thereby showing their protecting care of these people; and the obligation arises from the fact that there is a Mexican population who are thus protected. And if it is true that there is in New Mexico as large a protected. Mexico as large a population as that in Colorado, which we agreed last year to admit, I should like to know what argument can be advanced against this bill which would influence the Senate that voted so largely last year to admit Colorado?

The population of New Mexico at present is greater than that of either of the following five States at the time the laws were passed either of the following five States at the time the laws were passed admitting them to the Union—Oregon, Kansas, Nevada, Nebraska, and Colorado. If there is a species of favoritism in this thing, if we can pick out one Territory and say "you shall not come in with a certain population," and to another, "you may come in with equal or less," it ought to be explained. I do not think that that is the intention of Congress in dealing with the Territories. If here is a population in New Mexico as large as or larger than the average required of Territories becoming States, then by every principle of justice we ought to admit them.

A doubt with reference to the resources of New Mexico would seem to be hardly plausible. New Mexico has peculiar advantages for wealth. It is a great pastoral country. Of that there can be no doubt; and it has enormous wealth in the way of cattle and sheep. But New Mexico is something like California in one respect. If I am not mistaken, Daniel Webster, in discussing the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which California became a portion of the territory of the United States, said it was a land of rocks and deserts with rattle-snakes enough to fence it. Whether he ever said that or not, I do not know; I have never sought to verify it; but it is popularly believed that that was the estimate put upon California by Daniel Webster. I went there before the State was admitted into the Union wester. I went there before the state was admitted into the Chion in 1850, and I know the estimate among our own people at that time was that we had no agricultural capacity, or very slight. The idea of raising fruit in the mountains would have been considered absurd, and was so for a number of years after I went there until the first experiment was timidly tried, and the hills then blossomed with fruittrees at once bearing most magnificent and luxurious fruit. Our valleys were supposed to be sterile, to be impossible of cultivation; and yet now we are feeding Europe; we are beating Russia in the markets of Liverpool with the wheat which we send around the Horn, the product of our great valleys which were considered so sterile; and very much the same conditions exist in New Mexico. We do it partially by irrigation; we do it partially by differently alternating seasons; as for instance during this year the winter has been open, the snows and the rains have come on our State until the heart of the State is made glad by the promise of a harvest more abundant than that ever known to the history of the State, while last year the harvest was slight on account of the light rains and there being no snow whatever. So I say the seasons alternate. The vast crop of a single year is enough to enrich the State for five, the luxuriance is so single year is enough to enrich the State for five, the luxuriance is so teeming. We can garner in our granaries as they did in Egypt in the old time against seasons of drought or periods of slackness of trade, and wait for the markets of the world. These same conditions exist to a very large degree in New Mexico. They have these vast plains. They have occasional seasons of heavy rains. They have their mountains garnering their snow, with the opportunity for irrigation, as we have in California. Of course the great agricultural resources are confined principally to the valleys, but the valleys are broad and extensive. The mountains. I have no doubt, are adapted to fruit rais-The mountains, I have no doubt, are adapted to fruit raising as they are in California, and those mountains are seamed further with valuable resources of minerals, with coal and the precious metals, giving promise by and by of enormous development as our people shall pour in there.

Now, it is cruel to a Territory with from 90,000 to 150,000 inhabitants to keep them in this state of tutelage that we call a territorial government. I doubt if the ingenuity of mankind ever has devised a worse system of government than what we call our territorial sys tem, unless it is some form of tyranny. It is a careless and wasteful system. The wishes of the people are not consulted at all. The officers to rule over them are sent from thousands of miles distant. They have no knowledge of these men before they go there; and frequently the knowledge that they acquire of them afterward is such as to make them regret that they ever saw them. We have questions with ref-erence to judges who are sent there. I myself was very much trou-abled and pained by certain remonstrances which were recently sent to me as to a judge put in this very Territory with a request that he might be removed. There was conflicting testimony. On one side there seemed to be a very large number of people, including the bar, who protested against this man's continuance in office for reasons given. On the other hand a respectable gentleman said, and some Senators I think, "this man is a good man; we know him personally." But such a question ought to be, and under our system in the States is, resolved by the people themselves. Let them choose their officers, and do not keep in power over them a man of doubtful character, sent from a long distance, where they have no control over him.

Furthermore, a Territory makes very little improvements while it remains in the territorial condition. We have half of a promise to provide for them; we do pay the expenses of the territorial Legislature and occasionally we make a grudging appropriation for a public building. The consequence is that the people there do not tax themselves, do not set themselves earnestly to work in order to erect their public buildings. Occasionally we make a road there, partly on pre-tense of being a military road and partly on account of the wants of the Territory, but the people themselves do not pass laws and tax themselves, as they will as soon as they become a State, in order to make these internal improvements. It is like a farm which is held by a tenancy at will or by sufferance. The tenant does not improve it because he does not know when he will get a better right. who are there, not being exactly citizens, but mere denizens, in the long years before it may become a State, may become tired and move It is a question of the future whether benefits will be reaped from anything they may do now and whether they will ever come to them, and, therefore, they do not feel very great interest in building up a community. Furthermore, a public-school system is not much built up in Territories. We do not give the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to the Territories, but to them when they are admitted as States, and they constitute a fund for the benefit of the States whereby they educate their people. In my State, by a careful husbanding of this fund, we are able in every school district of the State to keep open a public school. Of course we aid it by local taxation in the large districts where there are multiplied schools; but in all the districts we keep open a school nine or ten months in the year, allowing the ordinary vacation, by means of this bounty of Congress. If we had been kept out of the Union for a dozen years longer, when population was pouring in upon us, these sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections would have been largely absorbed and perhaps other available lands would have had to be taken in lieu of them on account of homestead and pre-emption settlements intervening. So we do not nomestead and pre-emption settlements intervening. So we do not give the Territories the opportunity to build up public schools by allowing them to have a good fund, and we may prevent their having the means of having such a fund hereafter.

I believe in local self-government. So far as that goes, I always firmly believed in squatter-sovereignty; that is to say, that the people of a Territory should have a right to make their own laws, to elect, their own officers and to be American discussion for the control of their own officers and to be American discussion for the control of their own officers and to be American discussion for the control of their own officers and to be American discussion for the control of the

their own officers, and to be American citizens in fact; certainly when they have arrived at the respectable size of from ninety to one hun-dred and fifty thousand inhabitants.

I believe that New Mexico will make a good State in this Union. It is said—I believe the Senator from Vermont said—that its area of 120,000 square miles and a little over is too large; that it ought to be divided. I say that can be done by and by; but, if it is to be divided, by what size? Shall we take Delaware as the size of a State, and cut up New Mexico into Delawares; or shall we take Vermont, which is so much smaller than New York? Ought we not to divide New York in order to have four or five Vermonts out of it? Or is Massachusetts the size; or is California, larger than them all? It does not seem that the size of a State is a valid argument or the size of a Territory applying for admission. It would have been then a valid argument against Colorado, which is very much larger than several of the large States of the Union. New Mexico, on account of the large amount of mountain within it, stands in somewhat a different relation from a prairie State where every inch is capable of cultivation. Of course there never will be such a dense population on these grand old mountains which lift their summits into heaven; it is impossible, for population cannot subsist there; but all round about through those mountains there are fertile valleys which will sustain a population that will make a magnificent State in time; and the Territory now has a population who have a right to ask of us their admission; certainly a right to ask us that we shall treat them as we have treated others, a right to equality before the law and equality of laws for their benefit.

I trust, sir, that the judgment of the Senate will be this year as it was last year when this matter was fully debated and understood, was last year when this matter was fully debated and understood, and when by a very large vote the bill passed the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, from the little interest this question attracts, one would think that the introduction of an American State into the Union was a matter of every-day occurrence, or at any rate a matter of no great concern to the public, certainly not to the Senate of the United States. And yet, sir, no graver subject can be brought to the attention of the Senate of the United States than the introduction of two representatives upon this floor, representing, under our system, the sovereignty of an American State. As we shall guard that great fact, however, are the probabilities of the permanency of this system of republican government, in my judgment.

Now, sir, we are dealing with territories in a section of the country which it is well for us to consider before we make haste to enter upon the introduction of States from that section. That section of the country which lies west of a line drawn two hundred miles west of the Missouri River is exceptional in all its characteristics compared the Missouri River is exceptional in all its characteristics compared with that other section of country which lies this side; and when you come to consider the probabilities of States such as we know on this side, such particularly as lie in the great valley of the Mississippi, they constitute a severe contrast; and whoever shall examine them, either their climate, their soil, or their possible productions, will find that those characteristics are not very encouraging to the production of American States, especially the States that we know of our this side of that line. of on this side of that line.

Mr. President, let me give a single fact or two which will go to illustrate the character of this region of which I speak and its capabilities for stateship. Of course I do not desire to institute any invidious comparisons with any section of the country. I shall only deal with facts which I think are pertinent and bear possibly upon this subject. West of the line to which I have adverted one-half of the entire area of our territory lies. About fifteen hundred thousand square miles of our territory, independent of Alaska, lie west of that line. What are its characteristics, as we know them, as our geological and geographical surveys give them to us? It is a country enical and geographical surveys give them to us? It is a country entirely exceptional in its characteristics, its climate, its soil, and its productions. As a general proposition there is not more than one in a hundred acres of all that country that may be said to be arable land. Now, what do you say of the probabilities of the population of a country of that description? That is controlled by laws higher, vastly higher than any that it is known to man to overcome. Let me give you a little illustration from a fact out of our history. There are five States and nine Territories in that section of country; but they all only have a population just about equal in numbers to Massachusetts, that occupies a territory of between seven and eight thousand square miles. I am on the question of stateship, of what we are to understand by American States; and I desire to institute a comparison here that shall show what we mean by American States. Do we mean one hundred and twenty thousand square miles of territory, and nothing else? If we do, we have that here, and we have a State, and in this broad area to which I allude we have enough for forty or fifty more States equal to the State which lies near us here—Maryland.

Before we undertake to enter on this career of the admission of States, it is worth while for us to see the elements that this territory combines to give us the probability of these States being anything like the States which we know of on this side of that line. Massachusetts has, as I have already said, a territory of between seven and eight thousand square miles, and here is a territory stretching to the Pacific with 1,500,000 square miles, containing five States and nine Territories. The population of little Massachusetts is just about equal to the whole, by the census of 1870. Now you get some idea of what a State means. Look at Massachusetts; look at her population; look at her products. Remember now that all this territory which I am criticising embraces pretty much all the mineral resources in this country; and yet, though my honorable friend [Mr. SARGENT] speaks of feeding Europe from the wheat resources of California, if you will look at the annual productions of Massachusetts you will find that they are equal to those of all these States and all these Territories. Then come to the valuation. The valuation of Massachusetts is equal to that of the whole of them put together. That gives us a tolerable idea of what a State should be, of what it Before we undertake to enter on this career of the admission of That gives us a tolerable idea of what a State should be, of what it ought to be before it asks to be admitted here. It ought not only to have lands, but capabilities of lands. It ought not only to have that, but population.
Mr. SARGENT.

Do I understand the Senator's argument to be that Massachusetts, with its present population and wealth, must be set up as the standard to which any other State must reach before it can

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope my honorable friend will not feel constrained to assert that, because I have not said anything of that

Mr. SARGENT. On that ground we should have to exclude Maine on the same principle.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should be very sorry to have Maine excluded.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But I had not said anything—

Mr. SARGENT. I should be very sorry on my friend's account, if

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should be sorry on public grounds. I had not said that, and I had not the slightest idea of saying anything of the sort. I thought I took occasion to say in the beginning that I should institute no invidious comparisons and set up no standard and should only state facts with a view to getting some sort of an idea of what an American State meant or what it ought to mean in this system of government. Mr. MAXEY. W Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.
Mr. MAXEY. I ask him if it is not the fact that Massachusetts was founded a hundred years before the territory west of the Mississippi came in by the purchase of Louisiana, which was about seventy-two years ago? It seems to me, therefore, his comparison is not made justly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think my honorable friend is quite right in his recollection of history.

Mr. MAXEY. I would add further, that notwithstanding the country west of the Mississippi, to which the Senator has referred, is comparatively new, yet I think the fourth city in the American Union in wealth, and compare is west of that river, and so is the fifth in wealth and commerce is west of that river, and so is the fifth

Mr. SARGENT. I call to my friend's recollection, and no doubt he will at once admit it, that fifty years after the settlement of Massachusetts all New England did not contain the population that New

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I were to allow myself to try this case by sanguine expectations, I should of course see as I do not see at the present moment. We must deal with the facts as we find them and the facts as they come to us. The facts that are reported to us are as Those are the facts on the best information that we have been able to obtain. I had no invidious purpose in referring to Massachusetts, and I might-have referred to other States as well, but as the contrast was larger in the way of territory I did refer to Massachusetts as an illustration, not by way of showing the poverty of these people, as an illustration, not by way of showing the poverty of these people, not by way of an invidious contrast, but by way of getting an idea of what a State means, what its significance is. It does not mean acres simply, but I said in this connection as to the possibility of these acres that they are in an agricultural sense as one in a hundred. That is the information we have upon the surveys authorized by Congress and reported to us under official authority. It is said the Territory has relieved to the control of the surveys are limited, that is the difference of the same points of the same points. valleys that are rich. So it has, but they are limited; that is the diffi-culty. One acre in a hundred of arable lands is a limitation which does not justify agricultural population. Does not everybody know

Mr. SARGENT. Does that apply to New Mexico?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That applies to New Mexico; and we are legislating here in the face of that fact. That is what I mean; and I mean to say that if we undertake to divide this country, so exand I mean to say that if we undertake to divide this country, so exceptional in its character, into States like the State that lies nearest us, Maryland, and admit them on that basis, you revolutionize this body in which we sit; you are in danger of making this, as it never was intended to be, the popular body, based on what? Based on land not arable and a country that is entirely exceptional. That is the difficulty; that is the problem which we are settling here today. And when I hear it said by gentlemen that we should not make any distinction between this case and that of Colorado, I say, no; I did not, and I will not now. I did not vote for Colorado, and on this ground; there need he no haste about this far-off West; its people ground: there need be no haste about this far-off West; its people are not suffering; they are under the patronage of a strong and liberal Government. Can they not wait? "O," my honorable friend from California says, "the school system will be taken away if they do not get admitted." There is no great danger, according to my way of thinking, from that source—none whatever.

Let us look at another characteristic of this Territory which is knocking to be admitted as a State. What is her population? The last census told us 111,000; and what are they ? About ten thousand, about one-tenth or one-eleventh, speak the language which we know—are English-speaking people—people who have gone, as my honorable friend from California says, from the Northern and the Middle States. Who are the rest? About two-tenths or three-tenths are Indians, the men that we hunt when we have nothing else to do in the summer season, the men that we send our armies to force on to our reserva-tions, and feed scantily. Those are about three-tenths of the bal-ance of that population. And who are the others? Mexicans, Span-iards, "greasers." That is the class of population hungering and thirsting and suffering for stateship!

I do not think this is a case where we should make haste; that is what I am saying. I do not believe either soil or climate, either productions or population, justify what is attempted to be done here. Do this and then what? Arizona next, and by force of this example; and so you will go on. So you will have the representatives of States here which have not the characteristics of American States; which have not that concrete civilization, population, industries, and the like, which justify us in saying that they are American States. What becomes of this system of ours when the Senate of the United States rests on 121,000 square miles of unarable land with a single production? The Senate of the United States in some sense being legislative, executive, and judicial in its character, resting back on States, representing States, is the very bulwark, and designed to be, of our whole system. Impair that, and you peril this whole system of ours. Do you not do it when you trifle with States? Of course you do when you introduce two Senators here and one member in the other branch, thus popularizing this branch.

Then what do you say about valuation? What are the values of this property? My honorable friend from California in his enthusiasm made a remark which I am sure he does not mean to say is entitled to the truth of history on the facts. Enormous wealth in what? If broad acres measure, very well; but in what does the wealth consist?

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator want me to answer his question? Mr. SARGENI. Does the Schator want me to answer his question?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will answer it myself. The whole valuation as reported in 1870 was only $17,000,000, embracing everything.
There is no aspect in this case in which it can be looked at which should not put us on our guard against making haste in regard to this whole class of communities in the section of country to which I have alluded.

have alluded.

I did not know that this case was coming up this morning; it did not occur to me, and of course I made no preparation for the consideration of the question; but it is not new to me. I had a rosy estimation of the great far West. It was in my mind before I had seen it that it was precisely what I believed of the great Northwest and of that territory which lies between the Missisppi and the Missouri Rivers and just beyond, including Kansas and Nebraska; but when I opened my eyes on the far-off plains I saw that the possibility of the reduplication of American States was at an end. Whoever goes over those barren plains will see that by the immutable law of the universe no such thing as American States are there such as we have on this side. There will be exceptional communities undoubtedly, grazing communities, where we shall have the raising of cattle and the production of mines, always, however, under the limitations of which I have spoken. As a matter of statesmanship, and as a matter of common and ordinary prudence, the Senate of the United States should hesitate on all this class of questions.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, if it be admitted as a principle that a new State should never come into this Union until it has wealth and population equal to one of the older States of the Union, then you can never have any new States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is unfair. The Senator ought not to say that I suggested such a rule.

Mr. MAXEY. An invidious distinction has been drawn between the country west of the Mississippi River and the New England States, to the disparagement of that country. Let us look at the facts. About the year 1803 during the administration of Mr. Jeffers. facts. About the year 1803, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, the Louisiana territory was acquired. What have you there now? The States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, now? The States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and various other States. Let us compare the progress in wealth and in population of that country with any portion of New England. The city of Saint Louis to-day, west of the Mississippi River, is the fourth city in wealth and population, in commercial products and industry, in the United States. The State of California, which is represented by the Senator to my right, [Mr. SARGENT,] began to be settled by Americans in 1849. The city of San Francisco has sprung up, one of the most beautiful and wealthy cities in all the world, in the last twenty-five years. The State of California, which lies west of the Mississippi River, but a year or two ago, according to the agricultural statistics, raised enough wheat to load a thousand ships of a thousand tons burden each. Is not that wealth? In that ships of a thousand tons burden each. Is not that wealth? In that country there have been produced of the precious metals over $2,000,000,000, gold and silver, in the last twenty-five years—enough to pay the great national debt. Is not that wealth?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And that is, whether he means to say that the territory of California, especially that belt which skirts the Pacific coast, is a fair comparison; that the rest of the whole territory which I have characterized is equal to or compares at all with that portion of California in point of agriculture?

Mr. MAXEY. I will reply to the Senator from Maine that the beautiful valley of the Connecticut River is much more valuable for agricultural purposes than the top of the Green Mountains. In any country where you may go you will find good agricultural land and some that is not good.

Let us go one step further. West of the Mississippi River in 1845 the State of Texas came into this Union. It had then but two Representatives in Congress. Under the census of 1850 that was all that was allowed. In 1860, four Representatives; in 1870, six; and in 1880 there will be ten Representatives from the State of Texas. A half million bales of cotton are added to the wealth of the United States from that State alone. Go into the State of Iowa, west of the Mississippi River, which came into the Union when the State of Massachusetts was a full-fledged State, with great wealth and great population. It did not even belong to the United States when the Constitution was formed, and it is now one of the wealthiest States in this Union. Look at the State of Kansas, which came into the Union within the memory of all of us, which has grown to be one of the most prosperous of all the agricultural States. Take New Mexico, which has lain there removed from the means of transportation, having no seacoast, having, until recently, no railroads within reach of her borders, with the great gold mines of New Mexico which during the days of Cortez added wealth to the country, the most prolific of all the mines in Mexico. Some of them were found in New Mexico, but they have of late years been locked up because there were no means of transportation and because of the ravages committed on that country by the Arapaho and the Navajo Indians. That difficulty has been settled; railways have penetrated that country; and when those railways reach there you will find that the vast wealth which is locked up in the mountains of New Mexico, of gold, of silver, of copper, which are so essential to the development of the wealth of this per, which are so essential to the development of the wealth of this country and the payment of the national debt, will be opened up.

We all know that so long as a people are in a state of pupilage, so long as a territorial government exists, they do not progress as they do when admitted as one of the sovereign States of the American sisterhood. It is with me a question of right. Politics has nothing to do with my vote on this question. It is simply a question of pure, naked right. When the military commander of our forces took possession of New Mexico, in 1846, inducements were held out to these people to believe that they would be admitted as a State in the Union. By reason of that belief, during all the war with Mexico there was but little of it within the limits of New Mexico. General there was but little of it within the limits of New Mexico. Kearny controlled that country with but little difficulty. In 1849, in the administration of General Taylor, among his earliest messages was a message asking that the newly-acquired territory should be admitted as early as was consistent with the common good as a State into the American Union; and this is one of the last left. From its territory has been carved out and cut off the northern tier of counties and placed in Colorado, having less population than the Territory of

New Mexico. All I ask is, if Colorado can come in as a State in this Union, should not New Mexico? Have those people violated the law? Have they not been a peaceful, law-abiding people? Have they not the necessary population? With $75,000 as the entire debt of the Territory, with an annual exportation which yields in money $6,000,000, I ask if such a Territory as that has not some rights when you come to take into consideration that it has been under a territorial government for a quarter of a century? When you come to look at that southwestern country which the Senator from Maine seems to think is a sort of dark spot, there is not a more beautiful country on the green earth than the portion of it which he has thus talked about. Take the State in which I live. Within the last year 300,000 have been added to the population of the State of Texas. A 300,000 have been added to the population of the State of Texas. A large portion of that population came from the Northern States. It is as fine a country as the sun ever shone upon. All that is asked by the people of New Mexico is that they may have the opportunity of coming in and proving their faith by their works. It is because I believe that they are entitled to come in that I ask that it shall be done. Not that I would permit for an instant my idea as to what may be the probable political complexion of that country to influence me in doing that which I believe to be right. I believe it ought to be admitted. I think it has a right to be admitted. It has the wealth. All wealth is not limited to agricultural industries. Massachusetts, the very State which has been named here, gives us a bright chusetts, the very State which has been named here, gives us a bright example. No one has a higher respect for the knowledge, the enterprise, and the intelligence of Massachusetts than I have. Even in that State the vast wealth of Massachusetts does not flow from agriculture, but it flows from her commerce and from her manufactures. Mining is a wealth as positive as agriculture, as positive as com-merce, as positive as manufactures, and if the mining industry can be developed it is that much added to the general interest and the general good.

Besides, I see no reason why, if a Territory has conducted itself right and well for twenty-five years, the people of these United States should pay the expenses of keeping up a territorial government there. I think they should be permitted to form their own constitution and have the glorious privilege of local self-government. We all know that we would the task a bession window in the task as the second that we have the second that the secon know that we regard that as a blessing priceless in its nature. If they are entitled to come in, let them come in; and that they are entitled to come in there is in my own mind no question.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, I have been a little astonished at the position taken by my friends the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine in the discussion of this bill. The Senator from Vermont says before voting on this bill he would like to know the number of the Anglo-Saxon population of this Territory and whether there is sufficient wealth there to support a government. Is it true that the theory of our Government is that only the Anglo-Saxon race is entitled to self-government, and that only rich people have that capacity? The Declaration of Independence, the original charter of our liberties, took a ground so much broader, that the assertion of it was characterized as a "glittering generality;" but the logic of events has justified the broad scope taken in that instrument. The true theory of our Government is that people of all races are entitled to self-government. The history of the world shows that. The oldest republic is that of Switzerland. Its people are not composed exclusively of any one race. Properly speaking, none of them are of the Anglo-Saxon race, but they are of Teutonic ancestry and Latin ancestry.

The Senator from Maine spoke of different portions of this country number of the Anglo-Saxon population of this Territory and whether

The Senator from Maine spoke of different portions of this country being divided by certain lines. It seems to me as indefensible as the position taken by the Senator from Vermont to assert that the people on one side of a certain line are capable of self-government, but that those on the other side should be incapable. In the comparison which he has drawn between Massachusetts and certain of the Western he has drawn between Massachusetts and certain of the Western States and Territories, he seems to have utterly ignored a very important element, the element of time, an element so important that, as an anecdote runs, a certain person at one time said that the power of Omnipotence itself might be qualified by that element; and in illustration he said: "It would be impossible for the Almighty to create a four-year-old colt in a month." It seems to me that the expectation of the Senator from Maine, that the States and Territories of the West heirs but a four year-old like that the states and Territories. of the West being but a few years old, but a few years subject to set-tlement, should have such a population and such wealth as to com-pare with a State that has been built up for hundreds of years, is very unreasonable.

To the remark of the Senator that these Territories have no reason to complain, because they are under the patronage of a powerful Government, they might very truly retort that the kind of patronage which they receive is to have the constituents of Senators and members of the House from different States sent into the Territory to fill the various local offices that happen to be located there. That is about the extent of what might be called the political patronage that they receive. So far as the General Government aids them in carrying on their territorial government, so far as it aids them in a financial way, the argument of economy by the General Government would be to cease that payment whenever the people feel able to bear it themselves. On that ground and in the light of economy we may be justified in giving the people a chance to establish a State govern-ment for themselves whenever they feel able to do so.

Let us ignore the idea that a republican State under our Constitution must depend upon a population of a certain race, or the possession of a certain amount of wealth. The constitution of a State has been better described by Sir William Jones. In language which I am not able to quote, but which every Senator of general reading am not able to quote, but which every Schaol of general results will recollect, the rule established is that it is men who constitute a state, high-minded men; not men of any particular race, not men of any particular wealth. As to the character of the land, it is not necessary that the territory occupied by a free people should all of it be of the richest. It is not so in this country. It is not the ease in Switzerland, which I cited as the oldest republic in the world. There the agricultural lands are limited; there the valleys are very narrow indeed; and yet free government has been maintained in a respectable manner for a great number of years, and without any great wealth on the part of its people. I think such arguments go for but little in opposition to this bill. I believe the bill should be passed and the Territory admitted as a State.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I have very little, almost nothing, to add to the able argument of the Senator from Texas in reply to the Senator from Maine. It certainly, in my judgment, was the only inference that could be drawn from the remarks of my friend from Maine, when he held up the example of Massachusetts to us of what an American State should be, that only a State as large and as populous as Massachusetts should hereafter be admitted into the Union.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not say that.
Mr. SARGENT. I say that was the only inference from his argument. He showed us what these Territories were not, and then said he would show what an American State should be. If the argument was not valuable for that purpose, it was worth nothing; and it is was not valuable for that purpose, it was worth nothing; and it is very seldom my friend utters an argument that is worth nothing. It may be that this was exceptional. If so, I congratulate him that the exceptions are so rare. If he were to compare the agricultural capacities of Massachusetts with those of some other States, I think he would find that there was very little to boast of in connection with Massachusetts. To be sure they raise a great many vegetables there; but agriculture in the largest sense is almost unknown. What is it that makes Massachusetts so great? It is her manufacturing interest and the means taken to procure markets elsewhere in the world by creating means of communication. It takes the raw product of other communities and States and works it up into the manufactured article and sends it out abroad and gets wealth by it as England does. It is not the agricultural capacities of England that make it great. It is not the agricultural capacities of England that make it great. It cannot feed its own people. Upon a most sterile and a most inadequate soil there may be a thriving, busy, industrious, wealthy population. It is so in Massachusetts; and although England is not sterile, its soil is inadequate to its wants; and both are illustrations of the fact that other industries besides agriculture may make a State great and powerful. The $2,000,000,000 of gold and silver taken from California, although they have enriched other States, have left their marks there. The wealth of my State has quadrupled during the last ten years. This has been a large and useful industry marks there. The wealth of my State has quadrupled ten years. This has been a large and useful industry.

The Senator looks only to agriculture. The history of the whole world is that a mere agricultural community is a weak community and scarcely desirable, lacking average intelligence, lacking force, easily subdued, especially where their agriculture is not of a pastoral nature, where they take to the mountains. It needs other business in order to give balance and strength to a community. That is illustrated in the Senator's own State.

The Senator traveled across the Pacific Railroad and he saw some The Senator traveled across the Pacific Railroad and he saw some sage-brush plains, and consequently he supposed everything west of the Missouri River was of that nature. That seems to be the fair inference from what he said. He speaks of that which he observed. I dare say he can find the artemisia along the line of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads after he passed a certain point of Nebraska and went up the mountains; but in those very Territories, off a little way from the road, you will find valleys, where nature itself has performed the work of irrigation almost, which are fertile. The very lands that he refers to bring water upon them, and they are very fertile and enormously productive.

I wonder if the Senator when he was passing upon the edge of the

I wonder if the Senator when he was passing upon the edge of the desert in the State of Nevada saw the little spot at the Humboldt House where they brought the water down from the mountains, and House where they brought the water down from the mountains, and where grow fruit-trees bearing their fruit. I call his attention tothat spot on the very edge of the desert. Look at Salt Lake and the whole country round about it. It was reported twenty-five or thirty years ago as an irreclaimable desert, where man could not live and must take his provisions and water with him. That was the impression. All the exploring expeditions so reported it, and as absolutely irreclaimable. irreclaimable. A community went there and made it their homes, with some peculiarities which I do not admire, but nevertheless having a thrift and industry which should commend them to the approbastable and thriving, but brought from the soil evidences of its wealth in agricultural production, raising the cereals in vast quantities, and vegetables and fruit, and everything that is desirable. I dare say they raise more cereals in Utah than they do in the State of Maine; I have no doubt they do much more fruit, and of immensely better quality; and this right upon, the route of that railroad which the Senator passed over by Salt Lake.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I did not go there.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the Senator has not had the opportunities of observation that I supposed he had. He told us of his opportunities of observation, and the sage conclusions he drew therefrom, and now it seems he has not even been so far as Salt Lake. It is curious to know how far west of the Missouri he went. Perhaps he stopped on the eastern bank, and gazed over on that land, not promising to him, across the water, and formed the judgment which he made. If it would not be improper to form such rapid deductions, I should be tempted to believe it was that; for he is now confessing away all his speech by his pleasant interruptions to me as I proceed. My friend perhaps went to Du Luth, where, it is said by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the other House, the horizon comes around mittee on the Judiciary of the other House, the horizon comes around to an equal distance from all parts of it, thereby showing that it is the center of the world. Perhaps he thought he had attained that center, and it was not worth while to go beyond that. But I want to show him that the experience of Utah shows that a powerful and wealthy State can be built upon even these very arid plains.

What is there that maintains Utah? Its agriculture, its cattle, its mines. That very fact goes to show that my friend is entirely mistaken in his estimate of the capacities of that Territory. He says: Look at Massachusetts which for two hundred and fifty years has been

Look at Massachusetts which for two hundred and fifty years has been cultivating whatever soil it has, and has been improving in other directions faster by means of its manufactures and commerce. Very well, let him give one-third of the time, one-twentieth of the time to these communities to grow up. Should Maine have been excluded on account of the Aroostook country and of the region of swamps where account of the Aroostook country and of the region of swamps where there is nothing to be seen for mile on mile traveled by the lonely traveler except stumps of trees and devastations of woodland? Was that an argument against Maine? Certainly not. Maine has grown strong and powerful by its commerce, by its manufactures, and other business, and some agricultural capacity. To be sure it is rather tedious there during the long winter months, the eight months of winter shaded perhaps a little by spring at each end. The trial is very severe and it would be extremely irksome to the people in the West who are accustomed to the smiles of heaven pearly every month West who are accustomed to the smiles of heaven nearly every month in the year. But if you have advantages for agriculture, they are superior in that very desert country the Senator speaks about, where there are mountains in their vicinity from which streams can be brought for the purpose of irrigation superior to anything in Maine, unless it may be some garden-spot.

Mr. MERRIMON. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he can tell the Senate what the voting population of New Mexico is ?

if he can tell the Senate what the voting population of New Mexico is f Mr. SARGENT. I have not the figures here with me. Mr. MERRIMON. Have you an idea?

Mr. SARGENT. I know they claim a total population of 140,000. Probably they have somewhere from 100,000 to 140,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to get the voting population in order to see what proportion of the population was sufficiently intelligent to be fit for admission. be fit for admission.

Mr. SARGENT. The previous Delegate was elected by twenty-odd thousand votes, and Mr. Elkins by over seventeen thousand polled at

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the voting qualification?

Mr. SARGENT. The same as elsewhere. The ratio in one of these States, where there is so large a proportion of men, is one to about four. In my own State there was a time I suppose when there was one voter to two, but the proportion gradually ascends as women and children go in there, until finally it gets somewhere near what it is in the other States, but probably not till a long time. They claim from 100,000 to 140,000 population; and I suppose they may be conceded 90,000 or 100,000 at least, and if so they ought to have somewhere about 20,000 votes. My attention is just called to the fact that by the census of 1870 the population was 111,303, of whom 90,333 were

The Senator from Maine referred to the assessment of property in New Mexico in 1870. Eighteen hundred and seventy was a pretty bad year in New Mexico and pretty generally in the States. Furthermore, they do not require in New Mexico much taxation, almost none, and they assess their property very low. They support nothing by taxation, except perhaps the schools. The legislative expenses and all the territorial officers are paid by the Government of the United States, and there are very few purposes for which taxation is levied, and they are careless consequently about their taxation and assess very slightly. But the Senator will find in the column returned by the census of the true value of real and personal property that the amount was $31,349,793, and that was not an estimate of the value of mines or mining property—simply of other property. So that really the figures which he cited do an injustice to the Territory, I have no doubt, without any intention on his part. The Senator from Maine referred to the assessment of property in doubt, without any intention on his part.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to say that it is impossible to set up any just standard for the admission of States hereafter, drawn from the present status of those which have been admitted hereto-The State of Ohio, admitted in 1802, had but 41,915 population. fore. The State of Ohio, admitted in 1802, had but 41,915 population. Look at its teeming millions now. At that very time Maine was not separated from Massachusetts, but it had a population four times greater than that of Ohio. In 1819-'20, when it was separated and admitted into the Union, it had six times the population of Illinois, admitted about the same time as a State into the Union. Why was not equality shown then? Ought not Illinois to have been kept out until it had attained the population of Maine? That argument would have been good then; but the statesmen of that day did not urge it.

I have a list here of a dozen States which have been admitted, which are among the most powerful and wealthy States now within our Union.

are among the most powerful and wealthy States now within our Union, which were all admitted with one-half the population which New Mexico has at the present time. It is impossible for a new State to have the population and the wealth of an old one. The question is, Does it furnish a fair guarantee for the future? That was the only fair question that could have been asked of Ohio when it came forward with 41,000 people the only fair people.

fair question that could have been asked of Onio when it came forward with 41,000 people, the only fair one of Illinois when it came forward with 75,000 people.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether, as a fact, there have not been fifteen States admitted into the Union as States with less population than New Mexico had six years ago? Mr. SARGENT. That is true; and all this vast country in the West, out of which the great States to which I have referred have been carved, were acquired by purchase a century after the settlement of the States which are now set up as the criterion, as the mark which must be reached for new States to be admitted. I say such a doctrine is absurd. We can very well say farewell, then, to any further States, at any rate until long in the future; and we are to keep these Territories until they have each a million of inhabitants and thousands of millions of wealth before they are to be admitted into the Union. Who in the meanwhile is to govern them? Can you hold the Union. Who in the meanwhile is to govern them? Can you hold your empire together on any such basis? I ask the man who looks from the snow-banks in Maine on the country if he supposes he can have his Senators on this floor and his Representatives in the other

House to make laws for a broad extent of country into which his State might be thrown and it could not be found by a year's search, with teeming populations and growing strength, and they deprived of all rights in this Union? It is impossible. One reason why the overland railroad was built by the Government during the time of a prodigious civil war was that the neglected portion of the country might possibly secede. It was an argument that was used, strange to say, before the war broke out, and probably before the design was conceived in his mind on which he afterward acted, by Jefferson Davis, that, as a military necessity, as a necessity to bind the country together, a Pacific railroad ought to be built between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean; a strange argument to be made by him in one of his reports as Secretary of War. And afterward, when there seemed to be a tendency to a disjunction of the strange of the second of the se solution of the Union of the different sections, one striving to get away, the railroad was ordered to be built, Congress being largely influenced by that very consideration that a country so remote, and for whose wants or claims no sympathy was felt by other sections, inght gravitate away in the course of time.

I say, sir, that this doctrine of the Senator from Maine can be carried too far. I would not justify any assault upon the Union for such causes; but I say that I and every man standing in this place must estimate these things as they have been estimated heretofore. If it estimate these things as they have been estimated heretofore. If it shall be said, "Here is a populous, wealthy, and old State of the Union; now bring up your new Territories to the capacities of that State in all particulars, and we graciously will allow you to come into the Union," I assert they will not submit; and as they grow in wealth and population, and this injustice increases, more and more will they be disinclined, and neighborhood will carry neighborhood with it upon such a doctrine. We have lost nothing by admitting new States; we shall lose nothing by the admission of Colorado; we shall lose nothing by the admission of New Mexico, but will gain by it. We save ing by the admission of New Mexico, but will gain by it. We save, in the first place, the drain on the Treasury of supporting a territorial government. The people will support themselves. We shall gain by the additional stability which is given to the State, by the encouragement to emigation to go there and build up its resources and fertilize the lands. All our experience has been in favor of admitting the Territories early, from the time that Vermont was admitted with 85,000 people, in 1791, down to the present time. Experience has all been in favor of admitting these States and allowing them to grow up subsequently to power in the Union. For that reason I was in favor of the admission of Colorada and Lamin favor of the admission of the same states. the admission of Colorado, and I am in favor of the admission of this Territory. I would not do so until, however, there was a tax-paying population that were able to support a local government. I believe that 120,000 people can do this, and therefore I am in favor of their admission.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, there is nothing that makes the people of the populous States of this Union so restive as the inequality of representation that exists in this body. Four millions of people in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, four millions and a half in the State of New York, have but the same representation that New Mexico with less than the quota that is necessary for a single member of the other House will have if she be admitted. While they are willing to stand by the compromises of the Constitution and ready to recognize them to their fullest extent, as a representative of one of those great, populous commonwealths, I cannot consent by my vote to admit any new State into the Union until she has at least the number of people necessary to give her one member of the lower House of Congress. And, sir, this was the rule, too, until 1859; for until the admission of Oregon in that year every State that came to the doors of Congress and asked for admission had the quota that was necessary under the then existing apportionment for a member in the

This, it seems to me, too, is in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and is the true doctrine, for if it be not expressed it certainly is plainly implied in clause 2 of the first article of the Consti-

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers.

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, &c.

It seems to me that the plain implication from this clause is that the ratio fixed by the law for a member of the lower House is the test by which we try a new State before she shall be admitted to representation on this floor, with two members here, and to be equal in dig-nity, in power, and in influence with each of the other States, and equal, too, with the representation for a single member on the floor of the other House.

To my mind this in itself is conclusive. When we take the case of the States west of the Mississippi, to which reference has been made, they are found to come in in population up to this standard. Take the case of Minnesota, with 6,000 in 1850, it went up to 120,000 in 1860. All the new States are now found upon the census list equal to this standard save the States that were admitted since 1859, commencing with Oregon, and all those States are now far in excess of the number necessary for a single member of the lower House; but not one of these States, including even the State of Nebraska, by the census of 1870, had enough population to entitle her to a member in the lower House of Congress. The State of Nebraska, by the census of 1870, has not enough population for a member in the lower House of Congress; she has but 122,000, while it requires 131,000; and yet her representation upon this floor is equal to that of the three millions and a half of people, under the general of 1870 in the Comment would be proported. of people, under the census of 1870, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

This reversal of policy makes the people of the great States restive, and it causes argument and dissent in regard to the great compromises of the Constitution. Our people abide by the doctrine of the Constitution in giving equality to Rhode Island and Delaware, because it was necessary at the time to the formation of the Government; but we demand that the Teritories which seek admission as new States shall have the number of people that entitle them to at least one member in the lower House of Congress before they are permitted to come here and be made equal with our great States on the floor of

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am not disposed to offer any captious objections to this bill. I am certainly a friend of the West and the people of the West; but I cannot consent to vote for a bill of this kind in this form. Under the provisions of section 3-

All persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of this act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the governor of said Territory, the chief justice, and the United States attorney thereof may prescribe.

It would be very difficult I think to determine what is a qualified voter in the Territory of New Mexico. If I understood my friend from Texas correctly that question is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, an unsettled question. I have examined the acts of Congress providing for the admission of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and Iowa, and nearly all the States that I have had time to look at, and they are much more explicit and definite. They leave nothing vague and uncertain as this bill does, and I find as such authority given to the governor or to the governor and chief no such authority given to the governor, or to the governor and chief justice of the Territory and the district attorney, until you come to the acts of Congress providing for the admission of Nevada and Nebraska, and those two acts provide that the elections shall be under the rules and regulations prescribed by the governor alone, and not by the governor, the chief justice, and the district attorney. I cannot vote for that provision of the bill.

Another objection which I have to it is that it provides-

Another objection which I have to it is that it provides—
Said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the governor, the United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid to be held throughout the Territory at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, or any two of them, which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days from the passage of this act, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election.

It thus authorizes the governor, the chief justice, and the district attorney of that Territory to give thirty days' notice to the inhabitants of the times and places of election. I say it would be absolutely worse than a farce to undertake in thirty days to reach the voters of that Territory, as large as it is, without a railroad, with voters of that Territory, as large as it is, without a railroad, with mail facilities few, comparatively speaking. What would it be? It simply seems to me to be vesting the control of the election of the convention which shall form the constitution preparatory to its admission, and everything connected with it, in the hands of the governor, the chief justice, and the United States attorney. When we come to compare this with the bills for the admission of Nevada and Nebraska we find that in each one of those bills the day of election was fixed by law. I will read from 13 Statutes at Large, page 31, as to Nevada:

That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of this act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the governor of said Territory may prescribe. * * * And said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, on obefore the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives as aforesaid to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory.

The governor must order that election to be held on a given and fixed day. When we examine the act for the admission of Nebraska we find the same regulation in that act. The act requires the governor, on or before a day fixed, to name the day when the election shall take place in the Territory for delegates to the constitutional

I cannot vote to place such power, without some good reason for it, in the hands of three men. I know nothing about them, and cast no reflection on them; I even do not know who they are; but I am speaking against the provisions of the bill, their uncertainty and vagueness and indefiniteness.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I am very well aware that this subject has been discussed perhaps enough, and that what I may say will not change the vote of a single Senator; nevertheless, as the creation of a new State, as was well said by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine, is a most important function—perhaps the most important that the Congress of the United States can perform-I feel justified in saying a few words in behalf of this new sister.

It seems to me that the solution of the question depends upon one single consideration, because by the treaty made with Mexico we are compelled to admit any portion of the territory acquired from that compelled to admit any portion of the territory acquired from that country by that treaty whenever any portion of that territory shall have sufficient population. It is true it is left to the discretion of Congress, but that is understood to be the exercise of an enlightened and just discretion. If there be not population enough in this proposed new State, it certainly should not be admitted, because it would be wrong to give to a country without inhabitants, having nothing but lands and mountains and rivers, a representation upon this floor equal to one of the old States having wealth, population, education, and refinement. The question was well put by my friend from Vermont. I agree with most of his argument; but I think the facts are a little different from what he understands them-to be.

We know from the census of 1870 that the population of this proposed new State was then ninety thousand and a fraction. This is in accordance with the official census made that year. We know as in accordance with the official census made that year. We know as a fact that a tide of emigration has from that day to this been continually pouring into that Territory. We are therefore justified in believing that the statement made by the Legislature of the Territory that the population of that Territory is now equal to one hundred. tory that the population of that Territory is now equal to one hundred and forty thousand is correct. If you will look at the ratio of increase of population from 1850 to 1860, and from 1860 to 1870, you may very well conclude, applying the same ratio of increase, that the present population is fully what it is stated to be in the memorial presented by the Legislature of that Territory.

It seems to me that we are not in a position to deny these facts. That there is a population here of from 120,000 to 140,000 or 150,000 entitled, under the sacred obligations that we undertook when we made the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to come into the confederacy as one of the sisters of the confederacy? It seems to me the day has come when the contract is to be carried out.

ome when the contract is to be carried out.

But gentlemen say a portion of this population is not adapted to our system of government. That is very true, and the same argument would apply and could have been applied with perfect correctness to all the new States. When my own State applied for admission in 1820 it had a population of 66,000 persons, and of that population upward of 30,000 were not of the Anglo-American race; they were a French population. About one-half of the population of Missouri at the time she applied for admission were not of the Anglo-Saxon race, and yet that small foreign element as it is termed has been absorbed until it has nearly disappeared; and so it will be in this new country. til it has nearly disappeared; and so it will be in this new country. The population of New Mexico to-day, according to my information, is from 120,000 to 140,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to say that the census puts it at 90,000?

Mr. BOGY. That was taken in 1870.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the information on that subject

Mr. BOGY. A memorial on that subject has been sent to us by the Legislature of the Territory. Of course that is not athing we can depend upon conclusively; but it is, nevertheless, information that justiles action when it is sustained by the fact that we know that the population in 1870 was 90,000, that it increased from 1850 to 1860 at the rate of 50 per cent. in those ten years, and it certainly has increased at the same rate within the last ten years. We know this to be so, because we know outside that the tide of immigration pouring into that Territory is now and has been very large for some years.

that Territory is now and has been very large for some years.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend will pardon me for saying to him that I am quite suspicious of these statements. In 1864, when Colorado was here for admission, it was stated most confidently that her population was 100,000; and now I remember another case, and that was Nevada. She it was said had 80,000. We know what the result has been. Therefore I am very wary of these kind of statements.

Mr. MAXEY. I would remind the Senator from Missouri of the fact that the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the territory ceded by Virginia northwest of the Ohio was over one hundred and fifty years after Massachusetts was settled, and that now embraces the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, which have such a large pro-

States of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, which have such a large proportion of the population of the country.

Mr. WALLACE. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question in reference to the population. I find by the returns of the Delegate election in 1875 that the total vote was 15,781. Allowing five persons to a voter there would be a population of 78,000. Does he not think that a fair estimate of the population of New Mexico?

Mr. BOGY. It is very hard to answer all these questions at one time; I will try and take them seriatim. I think I can answer them all if I do not forget some of them. I will first answer the last question.

tion.

The vote given for the Delegate at the last election was, as stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, from fifteen to sixteen thousand. Counting five persons to a voter, there would be from seventy-five to counting ave persons to a voter, there would be from seventy-rive to eighty thousand population. But two years before the vote for a Delegate was upward of twenty thousand. At the last election there was no contest; the candidate himself was not in the United States; he was in Europe at the time, and there was no great occasion, as we say in my State, "to call out the voters," and persons did not vote "often and early," as they are said to do in some of the States.

Mr. WALLACE. In 1873 the actual vote was 16,934.

Mr. BOGY. I know when a demograte was elected there was a great

Mr. BOGY. I know when a democrat was elected there was a great contest, and when the democratic Delegate was elected the vote was twenty thousand and upward. It might have been in 1871; I am not particular about the time.

But, Mr. President, we must be guided by certain received facts. The census made under a law of the United States by an officer of The census made under a law of the United States by an officer of the United States gives the population of New Mexico in 1870 at 90,000, the white population, and it makes the whole population of New Mexico 111,000 counting Pueblo Indians and others; but what is called the white population was put at 90,000. We have a mode of calculation which is perfectly correct. In 1850 the population of the Territory was 60,000, as we know by official statements made at that time and published in the census of 1850, and in 1870 the population was 90,000. These are facts that are of an official character. We know that the increase has been for each period of the years equal to know that the increase has been for each period of ten years equal to 50 per cent. Bearing this in mind, it is clear that the present population does not vary and cannot vary much from what it is stated to be in the memorial presented by the Legislature of the Territory. It seems to me that these facts cannot be controverted. I know very well that there is a disposition in all these new countries to magnify the population, but I furthermore know that there is always a large population which is floating, which is not enumerated, and which from being a floating population very soon becomes a permanent popu-

I think myself, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the population of New Mexico to-day cannot be less than from 125,000 to 140,000 persons; I speak of the white population alone, leaving out the Pueblo Indians, and all other Indians. Therefore I think on the score of population it certainly has a just right to be admitted. We have never applied the rule of full population equal to the ratio of representation on the admission of any of the new States. I do not remember the population of Maine when it was admitted as a new

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Three hundred thousand.
Mr. BOGY. Then you have retrograded since that time, have you ot? What is your population now?
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Seven hundred thousand.

Mr. BOGY. My friend says the population of Maine was 300,000 when it was admitted in 1820, alongside of my State, Missouri. They were twin sisters; and it has now only six or seven hundred thousand. I think he is mistaken, although he ought to be better informed on that subject than myself. I think it was less than three hundred thousand—two hundred thousand and odd; but I was three hundred thousand—two hundred thousand and odd; but I was going to make an exception of Maine, because Maine was a part of the old State of Massachusetts, and the lower portion of Maine was rather densely populated; but it has progressed very slowly from that day to this, while the new States are increasing with great rapidity. Now, sir, what is the character of that population? We are not left in much doubt upon that subject. New Mexico was acquired by the treaty of 1848. By the census of 1850, it had a population of 61,000. As a matter of course, the population of that day was principally of the Mexican race; because it was only two years after we acquired it. It had then a population of 60,000 persons. It would be fair to say that in that population of 60,000 persons there were about 10,000 Anglo-Americans, leaving a Mexican population of about 50,000 persons. If there be a population of 120,000 to 130,000 now, you can very well see that the Anglo-American population greatly preponderates over the Mexican population at this day; and of that fact there can be no doubt.

In addition to this, a large number of these Mexicans are intelligent, educated men, and well adapted to our system of government. Again, as they are part and parcel of ourselves, it is nothing but wise policy to give them all the facilities as soon as possible by which they will be swinded. be assimilated to the population of this portion of the country by en-couraging emigration as rapidly as possible. It is better for us as well as better for them. My own opinion is that New Mexico is destined in a very few years to be a large and a populous State. I am somewhat acquainted with that country, and I think there is great misconception here with regard to the productiveness of New Mexico. The climate is delightful; and, although it has lofty mountains, it has very broad and very rich valleys. The country is remarkably well watered, and it is adapted better than any other portion of the United States to the raising of stock—cattle and sheep; and I have no doubt that in a very few years there will be in that country twenty-five millions of sheep. Yet that country will be self-sustaining with regard to its own food. It will be sufficiently a farming country and raise sufficient meat to supply itself, and it will be a self-sustaining community, destined to be, in my opinion, very rich indeed.

The policy inaugurated at a very early period of this Government was to admit these new States as soon as possible. That policy originated at the time when the Northwest Territory was acquired from Virginia in 1784; and, under that policy, Ohio was admitted at a very early period, and before it had the representative ratio of population. The same rule applied to the admission of Indiana, to the admission of Wisconsin, to the admission of Illinois, and to the admission of Michigan, which formed a part of the Northwest Territory. It was Michigan, which formed a part of the Northwest Territory. It was the policy pursued when my own State was admitted, when Iowa was admitted, and when Minnesota was admitted, and when the States farther west were admitted—Kansas, Nebraska, and Nevada. It was the policy which we adopted last year when we passed a law enabling Colorado to be admitted as a State; and if Colorado is entitled to be admitted, why is not New Mexico? There can be no doubt that New Mexico has a much larger population to-day than Colorado has a Mexico has a much larger population to-day than Colorado has. It had more population a year ago than Colorado has. It is true that a portion of the population of New Mexico is not of the Anglo-Saxon race; but yet there is a very large population there of the Anglo-Saxon race, and I think a proportion equal to the entire population of Colorado.

can see no reason in carrying out the policy of this Government I can see no reason in carrying out the policy of this Government which has prevailed for a great many years why this new State should not be admitted as a member of the Confederacy. There may be some objections to the details of the bill, yet in that I do not exactly concur with my colleague. I see no great principle violated here. I do not see that any great harm can grow out of the third section. No power is given under it to the governor of the Territory and the chief justice and the attorney of the United States to change or affect the rights of voters. They are only empowered to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary for the election to be carried on. No great harm could result from that. And then it is made the duty of the governor to—

By proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid, to be held throughout the Territory, at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, or any two of them, which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days from the passage of this act, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election.

It is made the duty of the governor to issue this proclamation within ninety days from the passage of this act, and it is made also his duty to give not less than thirty days' notice of the time of the election. The notice may be more, but it shall not be less than thirty days. Although there are no railroads in the Territory and mail facilities are not very great, nevertheless I hold that thirty days is more than amply sufficient to have the fact known throughout the whole Territory. Ten days, and less than ten days, will enable that fact to be made known in every precinct of the Territory. There may be some imperfections in the details of the bill; we cannot all agree about them; but I see no great fundamental principle violated. I cannot see that any great harm can result from them. I think the protection is sufficient.

I cannot see why we should now change the policy which has guided us for so many years since the admission of Ohio to the present time. Whenever these new communities have population enough to enable them to carry on self-government, it has been the policy of this country to throw them upon themselves, to let them govern themselves at their own expense, and relieve us from the expense of governing them, and also in deference to the great principle which underlies the whole system of our Government, that each community shall govern itself in accordance with its own views of right and justice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not suppose, sir, at this period of the discussion that anything can be said which will change a vote in the Senate; and I certainly do not desire to take a single moment of time uselessly in any such attempt. I desire, however, to call attention to and to correct two or three statements which have been made in operation to the presence of the bill position to the passage of the bill.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wallace] says that the older and larger States have been growing restive under the rapid admission of States into the Union with less population than is required for representation on the floor of the other House. That may be true; but that does not apply to the case of New Mexico. As I stated, when I opened the debate, that the committee were unanimous in the opinion, from the best evidence before them, from the best data which they were able to obtain, that the population of New Mexico at the present time numbers from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and sixty thousand, the Senator from Pennsylvania, in support of his argument that that was an exaggerated estimate, quoted the number of votes polled at the last Delegate election. There were, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, reasons why the vote should not have been full at the last election. It is known to most of the Senators, probably, that the candidate who was elected, who received a majority of the votes, was absent from the country at the time, traveling in Europe; that there was, practically, no contest, and therefore that the votes were not to any great extent called out. But, allowing that to be a standard, let us look at the vote of some other State. The State of a standard, let us look at the vote of some other State. The State of Rhode Island, the very years which the Senator quotes, at the last two elections poiled how many votes? The State of Rhode Island by the data—I read from the almanac from which the honorable Senator read the vote of New Mexico—polled in the year 1872 13,442 votes—about three thousand less than were polled by the Territory of New Mexico in this letter was the less than were polled by the Territory of New Mexico in this letter was the less than were polled by the Territory of New Mexico in this letter was the last was the letter was Mexico in this last year with no contest; yet the State of Rhode Island is represented upon the floor of the other House by two members. Therefore, by the Senator's own argument, the injustice we do here is that we do not give the Territory of New Mexico two members instead of one upon the floor of the other House. Look again at the State of Rhode Island. At the vote for governor in 1874 she polled in all but 13,924 votes, showing that the vote in 1873 was not exceptional.

Another misstatement has been made here. The honorable Senator from Maine said that there were but 10,000 who could read the English language within the Territory of New Mexico. I do not know what data the gentleman speaks from, certainly not from the census of 1870, because I find in that census as reported here that there were but 48,000 over the age of ten who cannot read the English language.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, does it follow because the ceusus designates these people as white that they necessarily speak the English language?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not aware that I said anything about white or any other color.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But 90,000 is the white population

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But 90,000 is the white population.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. I said nothing about that.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think my honorable friend is reading from the census.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is what the census says.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was reading from the census in regard to the illiteracy of the people. The honorable Senator from Maine said there were but ten thousand people who could read the English language.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Maine did not state that. The Senator from Maine said there were about ten thousand people who spoke our language. That is what he said.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. I inquire of the honorable Senator what is his authority for that statement?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is very much akin to that information which is so thoroughly relied upon by my honorable friend, that information which lies outside of the statistics that are given to us information which lies outside of the statistics that are given to us officially. As intelligent a gentleman as I know, connected with the survey of that country, who has been there several years, told me that was his information. The rest of the population, as I described, are Mexicans, Indians, "greasers," and mixed bloods, not speaking our language. If there are any larger number they have gone in since. I am not disposed to take very much on trust after the two experiences I have had here in the last twelve years as to the population of Territories when they apply for admission as States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know what the Senator means by taking these questions on trust. I inquired of the honorable Senator what was his authority. He says a gentleman connected with the surveys. That may be official; that may be in his judgment reliable; I do not know; I certainly have no means of knowing; but I read surveys. That may be omeial; that may be in his judgment reliable; I do not know; I certainly have no means of knowing; but I read from the official United States census of 1870, which says that there were but 48,000 people in the Territory of New Mexico over ten years of age who could not read the English language. That is my authority. I do not know anything that is better or superior, even a gentleman connected with the surveys.

Very much has been said in regard to the agricultural resources in New Mexico. The honorable Senator from Maine said he thought there was not more than one out of a hundred acres of arable land. Even if there were but one out of a hundred acres of arable land. Even if there were but one out of a hundred acres, it is far greater in proportion than in the States of New England. The valley of the Rio Grande, running all the way through the center of the Territory, I venture to say has greater capacities for agricultural production and will produce more in one year than the whole territory of New England will or has in a century.

The committee carefully examined all the data which were within their reach, as I said before, in regard to the two points which we thought it necessary to consider, the number and character of the people which we propose to endow with the great privilege of citizenship and the character, extent, and resources of that Territory, and we were unanimously of the opinion that it is the part of justice and wisdom for the Congress of the United States to allow the people of New Mexico to become a sovereign State in this Union.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Nebraska inform me why it was that this special provision was placed in this bill:

And the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid, to be held throughout the Territory, at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, or any two of them, which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days from the passage of this act, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election.

Why was that special provision put in there, not even requiring a newspaper publication of the election, nothing but a proclamation, which might be posted upon the doors of the capitol or anywhere else?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In what section is that?

Mr. COCKRELL. Section 3, page 3, beginning in the eighteenth

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can only say in regard to that provision that the committee followed the precedents of the last twelve years substantially. Certainly the committee supposed that with the restriction which provided that the notice should not be less than thirty days, and that the management of the details of the matter should be left with the governor, chief justice, and attorney, no injustice was likely to be done to any voter. The committee has no objection to any specific amendment of the bill in this respect. Nobody has any idea or desire that this election shall be carried by a trick or a fraud. We expect and desire that the honest sentiments of a majority of the we expect and desire that the honest sentiments of a majority of the people of New Mexico shall be registered; but we took the precedents as they have been established for the last twelve years, and we have followed them; that is all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desired when I was on the floor before to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the precedent in the case of Nevada and the precedent in the case of Nebraska. I have examined all the precedents anterior to that time, and I find no precedents.

examined all the precedents anterior to that time, and I find no precedent for this provision. The act for the organization of Nevada and the act for the organization of Nebraska are both identical, and they

And the governor of said Territory shall by proclamation, on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives as aforesaid, to be held on the first Monday of June thereafter, throughout the Territory.

The act of Colorado, which I have not had time to examine, I know nothing about, but the act in regard to Nevoda and in regard to Ne-braska and prior acts have prescribed how the election should be held, the notice that should be given, and fixed the day. I see this act does not require that this proclamation shall even be published. The gov-ernor may issue a written proclamation and post it upon the lintels of the capitol thirty days prior to the election, and no persons in that Territory, except his own personal friends whom he advises otherwise, may know one solitary thing about that election.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri in regard to his statement as to the precedents for this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed that the friends of the bill would certainly consent to as plain a proposition as that, but they seem determined to force the bill through just as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why does not the Senator offer an amendment

Mr. COCKRELL. The friends of the bill would simply try to vote it down

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator why he does not offer an amendment to the bill himself ?

Mr. COCKRELL. If I had time to prepare it I would move an amendment to the third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that the committee followed the precedents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The precedents of the last twelve years except in regard to Nebraska, where the chief justice and district attorney were not included.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to vote for this bill and shall vote for it, but I would like to have it conform to other acts admitting Territories. Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to point out one solitary act preparatory to the organization of a State that is similar to this ?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not mean that it must be similar in all things.

things.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean as to the power of ordering the election. I do not want this bill to put it in the power of one man or three men simply to fix the time and place of election.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why does not the Senator offer an amendment, and we can act upon it? Let him move to substitute the section in the Nevada act in lieu of the section in the bill to which he has called attention. The Secretary can copy it for him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to an amendment, such as is suggested, to provide for the publication of the proclamation in the newspapers for sixty days.

Mr. LOGAN, (to Mr. HITCHCOCK.) Just accept that amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will accept that as an amendment, to provide for the publication in at least two newspapers of general circulation for the publication in at least two newspapers of general circulation in the Territory for a period of sixty days.

Mr. COCKRELL. We had better have four newspapers. Let the people know what they are doing. Are there four newspapers there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Delegate from the Territory informs me that there are four there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 19, after the word "proclamation" it is proposed to insert:

To be published in four newspapers printed and circulated in different parts of the said Territory, and at least sixty days prior to the day fixed for the said election.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment cannot be made without a reconsideration of the vote on the third reading of the bill except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and by common consent the amendment is made.

Mr. BOGY. I presume after the amendment adopted in the nine-teenth line a change ought to be made to correspond with that amend-ment, and the word "thirty" should be stricken out and "sixty" in-serted in the twenty-fourth line. It is a mere verbal correction. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and by common consent the amendment is made. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On that question I ask for the yeas and

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (having first voted in the negative.) I ask to withdraw my vote. It occurs to me that I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll, which resulted—yeas 35, nays 15; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolu-tion for printing 100,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, and also a concurrent resolution for the printing of 200,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875; in both of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling; and A bill (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phœbe
C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan.

ADVERSE REPORTS RECONSIDERED.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, and by unanimous consent, the vote agreeing to the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Edwin Fairfax Gray was reconsidered, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, and by unanimous consent, the vote agreeing to the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. No. 111) for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams was reconsidered, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, the vote agreeing to the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. No. 578) for the relief of the administrative of the settle of Lieutanant Locals Whater decompositions.

trix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, was re-considered, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

On motion of Mr. HARVEY, the vote agreeing to the adverse report of the Committee on Claims on the petition of James Streeter, of Junction City, Kansas, praying compensation for property seized by the United States forces at Memphis during the late rebellion, was reconsidered, and the report placed on the Calendar.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the

A bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 2583) to provide for holding of terms of the district and circuit court of the United States at Fort Wayne, Indiana; A bill (H. R. No. 2582) to regulate the removal of causes from State to United States courts; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2572) to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases.

The bill (H. R. No. 2581) to amend section 3887 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 100,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874; 20,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 80,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1875.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 200,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875; 43,750 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 131,250 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

DISTRICT COURT OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was read, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof insert the following:

thereof insert the following:

That hereafter the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall be held at the times and places following: but when any of said dates shall fall on Sunday the terms shall commence the following Monday, to wit: At the city of Wheeling, on the 1st day of March and the 1st day of September; at Clarksburgh, on the 1st day of April and the 1st day of October; at Charleston, on the first day of May and the 1st day of November; and at Martinsburgh, on the 1st day of June and the 1st day of December; and all pending process, rules, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner and with the same effect as to time as if this act had not passed: Provided, however, That the terms of court hereby authorized to be held at Martinsburgh shall be void and of no effect unless all buildings and conveniences necessary to the holding of said court shall be furnished by the proper authorities of the county of Berkeley, free and clear of all cost and expense to the United States.

the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I see that, when my attention was diverted, the Senate agreed to a House amendment to a bill about the courts in West Virginia. I think it ought to be looked at to see that it does not interfere with other sessions and duties of the judge. I move to reconsider the vote and that the bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I would suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that there will be no delay about it. I will have it looked up and report it hask to the Senate.

and report it back to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote for the purpose of referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that the change in the dates suits the people and the court there. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont and to the Senate that the judge of the district has been here and I understand the dates suit the localities there; and that there has been a new court added at Martinsburgh, down at this end of the has been a new court added at Martinsburgh, down at this end of the State, and there is now no court perhaps within two hundred miles of it, and all the expenses attending it, as the Senator will see by examining the bill, are to be borne by the people, and not any part of them by the Government. I believe this is in the interest of economy, because the witnesses, jurors, &c., now have to be taken two hundred miles, and perhaps upwards of two hundred miles, to the nearest point to Martinsburgh, Martinsburgh, as the Senator understands, being east of the Alleghanies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I must express my surprise that the Senator

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I must express my surprise that the Senator from West Virginia should have asked the Senate to concur without a word of explanation in what turns out to be an important and material amendment, not merely as to time, as I supposed it was when I rose, but in respect to establishing a new court in a different place, which involves considerations that ought to merit a good deal of reflec-tion. I am sorry that my friend in his zeal for West Virginia should have asked to have the amendment concurred in without the usual reference, because in that respect it is exactly like a new law. The Senator knows perfectly well that those are the most troublesome questions of detail in the administration of justice that the Judiciary Committee have to deal with in respect to increasing and multiplying the places for holding courts. But I am sure that my honorable friend did not intend to have the thing go through without being properly considered, but supposed it was all right. I mean no reflection upon

Mr. DAVIS. The bill was amended, as is known, in the House and sent over here. It was an amendment to the Senate bill, which came sent over here. It was an amendment to the Senate bill, which came from the Judiciary Committee, as I understand. I certainly had no disposition to prevent it from taking the regular course. There was nothing said by myself or any one else; but the question was simply put on concurrence. I noticed the Senator from Vermont in his seat. I certainly did not think it was my place to make any objection when the bill as amended suited my people. I do not see how the Senator well could expect me to object to action of that character, unless he had happened to be out of the Chamber, and then it might have been said that I ought to have called his attention to it. I do not see how said that I ought to have called his attention to it. I do not see how the Senator could expect me to object to an amendment to a bill the Senator could expect me to object to an amendment to a bill which suited the persons whom I represent very well and which I believed to be in the interest of economy. In conclusion, the Senator said he did not refer specially to me; but I beg the Senator from Vermont to understand that I agree with him very well in his mode of doing business, to let nothing go until he understands it himself. It certainly was far from my thought to push an amendment or a bill through the Senate without the Senator knowing what we were doing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must apologize to the Senator from West Virginia, because he puts himself upon the ground that anything which is agreeable to his people it is not his business to object to. I was laboring under the impression, if I may so state it, of supposing that he was a Senator of the United States, and that the interests of the whole people were confided to his charge as well as the rest of us.

whole people were confided to his charge as wen as the rest of us. So saying, I leave the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I think I said, at the same time that I stated I was representing the wishes of my people, that it was in the interest of economy for the whole people that this change should be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question that remains to be deter-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote and referring the bill, with the amendment of the House of Representatives, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar of general orders is before the Senate, and the first bill upon the Calendar is Senate bill No. 172, fixing the salary of the President of the United States, being order of business No. 86.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., and the Speaker resumed the chair. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OPPOSITION TO PATENT EXTENSIONS.

Mr. SAMPSON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to prevent the extension of the Wilson patent for feed-motion and similar patents in sewing-ma-chines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

A. L. SHOTWELL

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2138) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims; which motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT PERE MARQUETTE, MICHIGAN.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 958) to appropriate money for the erection of a keeper's dwelling at the light-house at Pere Marquette, Michigan, and moved the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. ATKINS demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-six minutes after twelve o'clock, and this being Friday the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, beginning with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JESSE M'COY.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2505) for the relief of Jesse McCoy, and the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; which motion was agreed to.

SALLY CARROLL, (COLORED.)

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sally Carroll (colored) for bounty as a widow of Governor Carroll, of Company I, Fourteenth United States Colored Troops, deceased, and the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims; which motion was agreed to.

JOHN HALEY.

Mr. SINNICKSON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2585) granting a pension to John Haley, Company C, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARTHA R. ROBINSON.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2198) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha R. Robinson, of Portsmouth, Ohio, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SARAH EMMONS.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1939) granting a pension to Sarah Emmons, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Com-mittee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY H. KAISER.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, from the same committee, reported back with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2079) granting a pension to Henry H. Kaiser, late private in Company H, Eighth Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. HANNAH W. SUMNER.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN L. BARTLEY.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1278, a bill (H. R. No. 2586) granting a pension to John L. Bartley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MELVINA INGLE.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2587) granting a pension to Melvina Ingle; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH R. M'CRACKEN.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 221) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WIDOW OF L. H. ROUSSEAU.

Mr. JENKS, (for Mr. RICE,) from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadiergeneral and brevet major-general, United States Army; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANNA BRASEL.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812 the bill (H. R. No. 1246) to correct the date of the commencement of pen-Gordon's Company of Mounted Illinois Volunteers, and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ALLEN B. WILSON.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to report back, with an adverse recommendation, the memorial of Allen B. Wilson, asking for an extention of re-issued letters-patent for invention of device for feeding sewing-machines. I ask that the report may be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

The memorialist, Allen B. Wilson, on the 12th day of November, 1850, obtained letters-patent covering the invention of the device for feeding sewing-machines. These letters-patent were re-issued in two parts January 22, 1856, and December 9, 1856, and at the expiration of the term of the original letters-patent an extension thereof was granted by the Commissioner of Patents for seven years. This extension expired November 12, 1871. So that for twenty-one years Mr. Wilson has had the benefit of the protection of the patent laws and has been the recipient of the great advantages accraing therefrom.

The invention was a very important and useful one, supplying a mechanical principle in the manufacture and use of sewing-machines which had long been felt necessary to their successful operation. Its value was at once recognized, and by various arrangements with the inventor it was adopted by all the more important and extensive manufactories in the United States, the inventor becoming a stockholder in one of them. In addition to this, the several sewing-machine companies using this invention conceived the idea of forming a combination for the purpose of buying up and using for their joint and sole benefit the several patents which had been recognized as valuable in their trade. Their combined wealth enabled them to do this, and taking this invention as a basis they did form an association known as the Sewing-Machine Combination, by which they have succeeded in controlling the trude throughout the United States for many years.

The power thus consolidated in their hands has been used oppressively and tyrannically in many instances. It has been able to keep the prices of the machines at an unreasonably exorbitant figure; it has brought great wealth to the companies and individuals belonging to it, and it has stifled the growth of a free and healthy competition, and by this means has kept from the public other and useful machines which could have been sold at a much less price.

Your committee are satisfied that the memorialist has been fully and amply recompensed for all his trouble and expense in the invention and development of this device; indeed from a position of comparative poverty he has been raised by it not only to competency, but to wealth. From the statistics furnished us in the examination of this subject, it appears that this sewing-machine combination, in one of the companies of which Mr. Wilson was and is a stockholder, sold during the year 1870, 343,599 machines; during the year 1873, 442,813 machines; during the year 1874, 389,506 machines—making a total of 1,175,918 machines. These machines were retailed to the public at an average price of $65; and it further appears that they can be manufactured and sold, including a reasonable profit, for $32.50.

This combination, in 1856, fixed the fee for licenses to use this and the other patents owned by it at $15; in 1860 it was reduced to $7; in 1863 to $5, and in 1870 to $3. In addition to his profits as a shareholder in one of the combination companies, Mr. Wilson was entitled and no doubt did receive a portion of the royalties paid as license fees under the above schedules. With one exception, which will expire next year, all the patents embraced in and used by this combination are at an end, and the motives for such a combination will end with them; and then it is believed that the sale and manufacture of sewing-machines, a trade now so great and extensive, affecting directly almost every family in the land, will be thrown open to a free and healthy competition, which cannot be but highly advantageous to the public.

Your committee are satisfied that the public has paid very heavily for said invention, and that the inventor has been fully rewarded; and they therefore are of the opinion that the memorial do lie on the table.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I move that the committee be dis-

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, that it be laid on the table, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LUTHER HALL. Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, also, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2588) for the relief of Luther Hall; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Commissioner of Patents, upon due application made to him therefor, and upon the same evidence and que application made to him therefor, and upon the same evidence and rules of law as in ordinary extension cases, to extend the patent granted to Luther Hall and S. S. Hemenway, September 27, 1859, and numbered 25605, for a machine for shaping heels of boots and shoes, for the term of seven years from and after the passage of this act; and the bill provides that the said patent so extended shall have the same effect in law as if originally granted to said Hall for the term extending to the end of the term for which it shall be so extended; provided, however, that no person shall be liable for infringing such extended notent by reason of any manufacture, use or sale subsequence. extended patent by reason of any manufacture, use, or sale subsequent to the 27th day of September, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act. Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask for the reading of the report. The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Luther Hall, praying that an act be passed authorizing him to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for, and the Commissioner of Patents to grant, an extension of letters-patent for a machine for trimming the heels of boots and shoes, submit the following refor a machine for trimming the heels of boots and shoes, submit the following report:

The petitioner, Luther Hall, was the original inventor of the machine referred to in his petition for the patent for which he now desires an extension; and that letters-patent therefor were duly issued to him and one Hemenway as his assignee in the year 1859, which letters-patent expired in the year 1873.

The petitioner further shows that it was his desire and intention to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension upon the expiration of the original letters, and for that purpose he authorized and empowered one James W. Brooks to make his application, and for that purpose furnished him with all the necessary information and documents; but that the said Brooks from some cause totally neglected to give the matter any attention whatever, and petitioner being a poor man—a day laborer—unacquainted with the practice of the Patent Office and the requirements of the law, the time within which he might have secured an extension by the Commissioner expired.

requirements of the law, the time within which he might have secured an extension by the Commissioner expired.

The committee further show that the said machine is a useful and valuable one to the public, particularly to the manufacturers of boots and shoes; and that the petitioner has not been able to re-imburse himself from said patent for his time, labor, and expense employed in the invention and development of his machine; in fact, that he has not realized $500 for the entire period of his patent.

And the committee further show that the petitioner applied to the Forty-third Congress for an act authorizing him to make an application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension; that the petition was referred by the House of Representatives to the Committee on Patents, where it was examined and considered, and found to be meritorious, and a favore ble report made thereon.

The committee therefore concur that the general welfare will be advanced by permitting the petitioner to make an application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of his letters-patent.

They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. VANCE of North Caroling, Mr. Speaker I shall occurs the

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the attention of the House but for a moment in explanation of this bill. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee that the bill ought to pass. The petitioner is the inventor of a machine for shaping the heels of boots and shoes. He was entitled under the law to an exheels of boots and shoes. He was entitled under the law to an extension of seven years after the expiration of the fourteen years. He employed a party to appear before the Commissioner of Patents to obtain that extension, and was not aware, until the time had elapsed, that that party had failed to do so. He now comes to Congress and asks that the right be extended to him to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension. He has only had the use of this invention of the forest terms of the state of th tion for fourteen years, a period less than that now fixed by law, which is nineteen years.

The rule adopted by the Committee on Patents is that no recommendation shall be made to the House for the right to go before the Commissioner of Patents for an extension unless the case is very meritorious. We have carefully examined this case. The inventor is a day-laborer, not acquainted with the laws, and we think it is right that he should be allowed to go before the Commissioner of Patents, to ask the extension which he lost through the negligence of the party to whom he intrusted his case. If there be no objection, I will call the previous question.

Mr. NEAL. If I understood correctly the reading of the report of the committee in this case, it contained a statement to this effect: that the public welfare would be advanced by the extension of this patent; and I should like the chairman or some other member of the committee to point out how the public welfare will be advanced by the extension of this patent.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Well, I think the public welfare is advanced by the introduction of new and useful inventions. This man has introduced an invention which has facilitated the making man has introduced an invention which has facilitated the making of boots and shoes, and under the law he was entitled to twenty-one years; he has only held the patent for fourteen years, and we think he has an equitable right to an extension.

Mr. NEAL. He has had then under the law fourteen years' benefit of his patent?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. NEAL. It was by reason of ignorance of the law upon his part and the failure to avail himself of the provisions of law that he lost the extension? lost the extension?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. It was not the failure on his Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. It was not the failure on his part; the gentleman is mistaken in that. In due time, before the expiration of his patent, or within ninety days of the expiration of his patent, he employed a man to get the extension, and that man, for some reason unknown to the petitioner, failed to apply for it, and therefore the patent was not extended. This is simply a proposition that he be allowed to go before the Commissioner of Patents and if he has a good case that the Commissioner shall be permitted to grant an extension

I hope the House will vote down the report of the com-Mr. NEAL. mittee. I think if there is one evil from which the people of our country have suffered more than another, it has been by monopolies growing try have suffered more than another, it has been by monopolies growing out of the patent laws, and I think it is about time that an end was put to all legislation of this kind.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I fully agree with the gentleman from Ohio that monopolies ought to be voted down, and I think the Committee on Patents stand justified by the report which immediately preceded this one. In that report monopolies were properly dealt with, as we conceive. This man, Luther Hall, according to the testimony before the committee, has only received about $500 for his invention. Is that a monopoly, sir?

invention. Is that a monopoly, sir ?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing in regard to this special case, because it is perfectly new to me; but I know this, that I am perfectly conversant with the mode of operation of a company in Boston that can control all the principal patents appertaining to the manufacture of boots and shoes. Although it may not be true in this case, I know that it has been in others where they have investigated and found patents that have been taken out by parties and when they were about to expire this combination, being alert and perfectly conversant with the patent laws, have succeeded in obtaining the renewal of such patents where there has been no benefit whatever to the original inventor.

Sir, I will not pretend to charge that this is one of those instances, but I have very grave apprehension that it is; and for my own part, knowing the operations of the company, I shall vote against granting the permission asked by the Committee on Patents even though it be unanimously asked.

I know, sir, the operations in that line of business, and that one corporation alone avail themselves of the most valuable improvements in the manufacture of boots, and there is no branch of mechanical business that has been so facilifated by the production of labor-saving machinery as the manufacture of boots and shoes. I know of one patent that is to expire in the course of a few years and in which an application of extension may come here, and I know that the inventor of that patent has received nominally nothing for it; and yet it has produced to the present owner several millions of dollars, the annual interest coming into their treasury being over $500,000. And I say that this is no time to renew or extend any such patent, and for my own part, with the general knowledge which I have on this subject,

With the general knowledge which I have on this subject, I carnestly oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I now call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the call; and upon a division there were—ayes 56, noes 41.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no further count is demanded, the previous question will be regarded as seconded.

No further count was called for.

The question was then taken upon ordering the main question; and upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes 66.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Is there a quorum voting?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Is there a quotum voting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum voted. Does the gentleman call for tellers or insist on a further count?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I will not call for a further count. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the main question is not ordered. Mr. OLIVER. I move that the bill be laid upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

JAMES WYMAN.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2176) for the relief of James Wyman.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill authorizes James Wyman, of Stillwater, Saratoga County, New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension for seven years of letters-patent granted to him for the invention of a new and useful improved machine for setting the staples in blind-slats, dated August 24, 1858, and numbered 21292; and the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to extend said patent as if application had been made within the time limited by law; provided that, if the patent be extended, no damages shall accrue for infringement thereof committed since the original patent expired and before the date of the extension. the date of the extension.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report was read, setting forth that upon the 24th of August, 1858, letters-patent were issued to James Wyman, of Stillwater, New York, for the invention of a new and useful machine for setting the York, for the invention of a new and useful machine for setting the staples in blind-slats; that the machine was the result of many years of study and experiment on the part of Wyman, and was the first that everdid the work properly. After patenting the machine, Wyman was diligent in seeking to introduce it into public use; but, owing to public prejudice or distrust of the practicability of such a machine, his efforts were futile. He continued his efforts and devoted much of his time to presenting his invention to the public, meanwhile supporting himself and family by his daily labor as a carpenter, being destitute of means except such as he was able to earn from day to day. He is still a poor man, and has never realized a dollar for the many years is still a poor man, and has never realized a dollar for the many years of time and the labor he had devoted to the invention. The patent expired August 24, 1872, but the fact was not known to the inventor until March, 1874, when he applied to Congress for relief, which the committee recommend be granted.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. In regard to this case I will say that Mr. Wyman, for whose benefit this bill is reported, is a poor man, a carpenter by trade, who some years ago conceived the idea of inventing a machine for wiring or fastening the slats of window-blinds. He endeavored to interest in his machine parties with capital, and finally succeeded in finding persons who were willing to propose in the enter. succeeded in finding persons who were willing to engage in the enter-Upon examining his letters-patent it was found they had expired. In this dilemma he applies to Congress for relief. As I have already said, Mr. Wyman is a poor man, supporting himself and family by his daily labor. The parties proposing to assist him agree to pay him $2 for each machine manufactured and sold, and estimate that about three hundred machines can be disposed of each year. This will give Mr. Wyman an income of about $600 a year from this patent. It has had no extension, and, as the law seems to contemplate that a patent should have at least one extension, the committee think it just to grant this petition. The public has not yet paid anything for the patent, and, while it is of some interest to the inventor, it is of but little interest to the public.

Mr. DE BOLT. When was this patent granted?
Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. August 24, 1858. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON.]
Mr. SAMPSON. I feel it my duty to oppose the passage of this bill. I am a member of the Committee on Patents, and have opposed the bill now under consideration from the time it came to my attention in the committee. I base my opposition principally upon this ground, that where any individual applies to Congress for relief through a special law there should be strong, equitable reasons for the enactment of that law. This special law grants to the particular the enactment of that law. This special law grants to the particular individual privileges that are not enjoyed by citizens generally. For that reason I say that, when any individual presents himself here and asks special privileges under a special act, his application should be sustained by strong, equitable reasons. I voted for the bill which was reported from the committee just before this. The applicant in that case lost his rights and privileges which belonged to him under the law, not through any negligence on his part, but through the negligence of his attorney. He made his application for the extension within the time required by law, but through the negligence of negligence of his attorney. He made his application for the extension within the time required by law, but through the negligence of his attorney he lost that right. He was a poor man, had made nothing from his patent, and lost his rights through the negligence of another, and for that reason I voted for his bill. But that is not the case here.

In this case the patent was granted in 1858. The patentee should have made his application for the extension prior to the 24th of August, 1872, but failed to do so. If he had a sufficient reason for that failure, then he might have some standing here when he asks for that failure, then he might have some standing here when he asks for the passage of a special law to relieve him. But he simply states that he forgot the time when the patent expired. His failure is the result of his own negligence. His rights under the law were lost because he had forgotten the time when his patent expired. To pass this bill for his relief would be setting a dangerous precedent. We might as well say that every man who forgot the time when his patent expired, after the lapse of three or five years might come here and have his patent extended, although the loss was the result of his own negligence. It seems to me this would be an unsafe precedent, and that we ought to oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. DE BOLT. It seems to me, sir, that the enjoyment of the exclusive privileges of a patent for the term of fourteen years is long enough for any individual. If there are any advantages to be derived from a patent, they certainly ought to be obtained within that time. If within that period a patentee has failed to secure any benefits from his patent, either the invention must be of no great public utility, or the failure must have resulted from his own neglect. This utility, or the failure must have resulted from his own neglect. This being so, it seems to me he has no right to come to Congress asking to have the patent extended. The people have some rights in this matter; but from the manner in which patents have been extended, they have great ground for complaint. They have been imposed upon.

Therefore I am opposed to any extension of this kind.

Mr. HATHORN. Mr. Speaker, this Mr. Wyman is a laboring-man; he is a poor man; there are no "millions" in this bill. The utmost benefit he can expect from this patent is merely a few hundred dollars a year. During the years when this patent was running and when he could not induce any capitalists to assist him in introducing the invention, he had all he could do to support his family. I think that if any patentee should be allowed the privilege of going before that if any patentee should be allowed the privilege of going before the Commissioner of Patents and making application for a renewal, this is such a case. The patentee will not be able to make more than two or three hundred dollars a year out of it; and it does not interfere with any other patent. Being an ignorant man, he did not know anything about the law; and being occupied as a day laborer in taking care of his family, he overlooked the fact that his patent was about to expire. Hence I hope this House will vote to allow him the privilege of applying to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of seven years.

privilege of applying to the commissioner of ratents for an extension of seven years.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. The Committee on Patents had their sympathies strongly excited in this case. They were aware of the facts stated by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. Sampson,] but they had not expected any opposition to be made in the House by any member of the committee. The patent expired because this man was ignorant of the law; and when the arrangement was made by these parties who were to introduce the invention into use, they investigated the matter and found that the patent had expired.

the matter and found that the patent had expired.

Although our sympathies were excited in this case, yet I will say that there are many cases in which our sympathies have been excited that we do not think proper to report upon favorably. Most of these applications for renewals the committee have reported adversely. But this is one of those cases where the inventor has not received one dollar for his invention, although it had been developed with a good deal of ingenuity; and we felt it a matter of justice to him that he should have an opportunity to obtain some little compensation for

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Does this bill propose the renewal of the patent, or only that the patentee be allowed to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for a renewal !

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. The committee have refused in toto to report any bill extending a patent absolutely. This bill simply proposes to allow the patentee to go before the Commissioner and have a full hearing of the question upon its merits; and if the Commissioner finds sufficient grounds for the extension, he is authorized to grant it.

Mr. SAMPSON. I wish to refer to the argument which has been made in favor of this bill, that this inventor, being a poor man, he made in favor of this bill, that this inventor, being a poor man, he ought to have the privilege of an extension in order that he may be remunerated for his invention. While I am willing to favor poor men and believe that their rights should be more carefully guarded than those of the wealthy, still I think gentlemen ought to reflect that while this inventor may be poor there may be many other poor men who may have expected to engage in this particular business upon the expiration of the patent; knowing that they would have the right to use this machine, they may have prepared themselves to engage in this branch of business. Many a poor mechanic may have had his all invested in that way, may have expended his money and made preparations upon the expectation that when the term of the made preparations upon the expectation that when the term of the patent had expired it would not be extended, and there was the more reason for this expectation because nearly two years elapsed after the expiration of the patent before the patentee even applied to this House for an extension.

Now I think the rights of poor men everywhere should be looked after; the public generally should be protected as well as inventors. When inventors have enjoyed the full term of their patents under the law, then if other poor men have engaged in manufactures of this kind, their rights ought to be protected. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument, so far as it is founded upon a consideration of the rights of poor men, is on the other side of the case.

Mr. J. H. BACLEY. It is in evidence before the committee that no parties have manufactured these machines. Had we found that such was the case, we would perhaps have made a different report. But we found that no parties whatever except the inventor are to be

Mr. NEAL. If this case is one that should be made exceptional, I would like to know how it happens that the committee is divided upon its merits, when a bill upon which the committee was unanimous has just been rejected by the House.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. Well, sir, I must confess that I was not aware that any member of the committee would say a word in opposition to this bill. But I will say there might be presented a case of a poor man where our sympathies would be excited and yet where we might not consider it proper to report favorably.

Mr. NEAL. It seems to me the committee can hardly expect the House to pass a bill on which the committee are divided, when a bill reported unanimously has just been rejected.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The House divided; and there were-ayes 29, noes 61; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. J. H. BAGLEY and Mr. SAMPSON.

The House again divided; the tellers reported—ayes 40, nays 69. So, the House refusing to order the third reading and engrossment f the bill, it was rejected.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to lay the bill upon the table. The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is entirely unnecessary, as the bill has been rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The refusal of the House to engross the bill rejects it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I hope by unanimous consent the bill will be permitted to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for further consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from ew York is not debatable. Mr. CONGER. I make a personal request of the gentleman from New York and of the House to allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I withdraw my motion. Mr. CONGER. I have no further interest in this bill than to see ustice done to this man. I move to reconsider the vote by which the ill was lost

Mr. OLIVER. And I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I have not yielded the floor. I wish to make a remark or two before the question is taken on my motion. I was not present when this question was considered in the Committee on Patents, and desired to express some views on it when it came before the House. I believe there is good reason why the House should further consider it and hear more particularly than they have the circumstances which to the committee made it proper to report the measure to the House

I desire to ask this House not in its zeal to reject all questions connected with patents—it is unworthy the dignity of this House to do so merely because they are patents—but to receive here such applications of citizens of the United States as feel they have without wrong or without cause lost the right guaranteed to them by the Constitution and by the law of the land that they should have the opportunity of coming to this last place of appeal to be re-instated in that right. I consider this, Mr. Speaker, to be one of that class of cases, and I venture, as I have heretofore ventured, to suggest to the House whenever the Committee on Patents recommend, in the judgment of the House, any improper measure, whenever this committee lose the confidence of all the members of the House in their judgment and fidelity to the interests of the people, then it will be proper enough to refuse them a hearing in a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar upon any subject they propose.

I have made this motion that this matter may come up in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, so there may be discussion on it and some principle settled in regard to the action of the committee which this case involves, as well as for the judgment of the House as for the action of the committee. I hope there may be no objection at least to this being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It is for that object I have made the motion to reconsider. If the House reconsider and refer it, the committee may receive some suggestions and some instruction from the House to guide them in regard to other cases still pending or to come before them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not say that I will object to unanimous consent being given to the geutleman from Michigan to have this bill put upon the Private Calendar, but I see no reason why the bill cannot be discussed now just as well as in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. This is Friday, and we have as much time as we ever will have to discuss a bill extending a patent. Now, sir, it must be an extraordinary case where I will vote to extend a patent which has been enjoyed for fourteen years. I do not mean to say we are not benefited measurably by our inventors, but I do say that one of the greatest annoyances to which many of the industries of the United States are subjected is because of the present patent law and the abuses under it. As agricultural, mechanical, and other industries grow and advance, the necessary changes which are other industries grow and advance, the necessary changes which are suggested are picked up by somebody who can get to Washington first, and here they are patented. The great advance made lately in agricultural machinery has resulted from the suggestions of the men who use it in the field. The man who makes the machines obtains these suggestions and then secures a patent for them, thus putting additional expenses upon the men who have to buy them.

Now, sir, I believe our patent laws should be materially modified. I believe the time should be shortened instead of lengthened.

If the gentleman from Michigan has a case of distress: if this man

If the gentleman from Michigan has a case of distress; if this man through extreme ignorance, ill health, or anything else, has lost any right which he was entitled to; if he has conferred a great benefit on the people of the United States and insists he should be rewarded, let us give him a sum of money for the benefit he has done us. But

I cannot consent that a man who has had the benefit of a patent for fourteen years should have his patent extended.

As I have said, however, I will not object, if my friend from Michigan insists upon it, to this bill being placed upon the Private Calendar, because he is too good and too accommodating a man to refuse his request in that regard. I think it can be discussed as well here, and whatever principles have to be settled can be settled as well now in the House as at any other time in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. The reason why I did not ask for the discussion to go on now is because I understand there is a special order to-day which will take up all the time, and besides it would take up the time of the morning hour which is necessary to receive reports from committees. If the bill be placed upon the Private Calendar in Committee of the Whole House, it can be taken up and receive full discussion there when it will not interfere with other business. That was the reason why I have not spoken to the merits of the question today. The morning hour will soon expire, and if the discussion were begun it could not be pursued. I believe there is no objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar

Mr. OLIVER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONGER. I will not exercise my right to demand a further count, no quorum voting, if gentlemen of the House take no further interest in this matter than to leave the House without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further count being demanded the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected is laid upon the table.

GOVERNMENT GOLD BALANCES.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to offer, at the request of my colleague, [Mr. Hewitt,] who has been called home, the following resolution: The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of this House adopted January 31, 1876, states the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury at the close of business on the 25th of January to have been as follows, to wit:

Gold bullion     10, 254, 409 59       Silver coin     11, 202, 256 60       Silver bullion     4, 146, 932 67	Gold coin	$44, 659, 128 24
Silver coin 11, 202, 258 60 Silver bullion 4, 146, 932 67	Gold bullion	10, 254, 409 59
Silver bullion	Silver coin	11, 202, 258 60
	Silver bullion	4, 146, 932 67

caused.

And that the said committee be further instructed to ascertain whether the legal-tender notes received by the Treasury for the redemption of national bank notes are kept as a special fund separate and apart from all other moneys of the United States, or whether they are held in the Treasury in common with such other moneys, the amount thereof being merely deducted at the close of the month from the full amount of legal-tender notes then in the Treasury.

And that the said committee make report to this House upon the matters herein referred to it with all possible dispatch, in order that the actual financial condition of the Treasury may, if possible, be made plain before any further legislation is had in reference to the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object to the resolution being considered at this time. Let it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and if they think proper, they can report it back to the House for adoption.

Mr. COX. I have presented the resolution at the request of my colleague, [Mr. Hewitt.] I suppose if any gentleman objects it will have to be referred. But I think it is only causing needless delay to refer the resolution instead of adopting it at once.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object to the present consideration of the resolution, but am willing that it should be referred to the Com-

Mr. COX. Very well; let it be so referred.
Mr. KASSON. I would suggest that the resolution be printed.
There was no objection, and the preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT JUDGE IN COLORADO TERRITORY.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with the recommendation that it be adopted, the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved. That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House at an early day copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the removal of Judge Belford, a district judge for the Territory of Colorado, and copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the appointment of Judge Stone to succeed Judge Belford; also, copies of all papers, letters, and telegrams appertaining to the alleged arbitrary and corrupt ruling, orders, and decrees of Judge Stone in the interest of those who procured his appointment, which are now on file in the Office of the Attorney-General; also, the names of all persons who, otherwise than in writing, demanded the removal of Judge Belford and the appointment of Judge Stone.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object. Mr. HUNTON. Then I withdraw the resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling;

An act (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phæbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the following concurrent resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 200,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875, 43,750 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 131,250 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 25,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The concurrent resolution was adopted.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back a concurrent resolution for printing the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, with a substitute therefor, and to recommend that the substitute be adopted. The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 100,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, 20,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 80,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The substitute was agreed to, and the concurrent resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution, as amended, was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

No objection being made, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the credit of the American Government and the honor of the American name have been too amply vindicated in the history of the past fourteen years to leave us any fear that they can become the football of partisans, nor do they need to stand pleading for the good opinion of the world. To quote the appropriate figure of my eloquent friend from New York, [Mr. Townsend,] the terrible tribunal before which we carried the question of the existence of this nation and the inestimable decision, finally rendered at Appomattox, gave to our Government a baptism of fire guaranteeing its perpetuity and place among the nations. That trial cost us half a million of lives and between five and six billions of dollars. That enormous sum, which we can compute in figures but hardly realize, has been more than half paid already. With the single exception of the French Empire in its late war, no nation has ever evinced such extraordinary vitality and recuperative power, and the French government, as one of its ministers justly observes, had not paid its debt, but only changed its creditors. No people ever before made such extraordinary sacrifices to redeem their credit as the American people. No government ever before so rapidly advanced the value of its securities. Our interest-bearing securities, which we were forced to hawk in every corner for less than 50 per cent. of their face, now command in the market of the world a premium of from 6 to 12 per cent. above the price of gold, and our non-interest-bearing debt, which derives its commercial value from its utility as money, has risen in value 170 per cent. risen in value 170 per cent.

With some limitations, I agree with the gentleman from Maine when he says that the "specie standards of the world rule us to-day and have ruled us through all the legal-tender period;" and I add that they have ruled us ever since we had a Government. They ruled us in the days of Continental money; they ruled us in day of de-based silver coin; they ruled us in the day of irredeemable State and private-bank paper; they ruled us in the terrible trial of war, and they have ruled us since peace came with its blessings on the and they have ruled as since peace came with its diessings on the wings of God's angels of mercy. But the law which governs the standards of value rises above the legal-tender act, and it rises above the matrix and the die with which by law we pronounce so much gold ten dollars and stamp ninety cents worth of silver as one dollar.

The gentleman's mode of stating the case has a tendency to lead the public mind into grave misconception. At the present moment the advocates of forced contraction represent our promises to pay, which have the property of circulating as money in lieu of interest, as lies and frauds, as something which derives its value only from law. Our legal-tender act never regulated the value of our legal-tender. It sunk when our credit sunk and rose when our credit rose. It was not a "be it enacted" that brought it up from two eighty-five to the present price. If the legal-tender act had fixed its standard of value it would always have been worth a dollar in gold. It did not do that, it could not do that

But if our legal-tender act did not fix its value neither did the laws of any or all foreign governments or the stamps and dies on their coin. There is no such thing, and there never has been such a thing, as a universal coin standard of values. Each nation fixed by law its own standard of values. This is an exercise of authority guaranteed to our Government by express constitutional provision, but which, of necessity, belongs to every government. It is as essential to it as the breath to the human body. This authority does not derive its virtue solely from the article it uses; but it ceases to have any power the moment it tries to cross the frontier. Whether the article is interest-bearing bonds, or stamped coins, or non-interest-bearing notes, at the borders of each nation they are simply commodities like our wheat and cot-We have always had theorists desiring a universal standard of weights and measures and a universal standard of values; but the latter at least is a mere chimera, for even if we could agree on a standard it would be trampled out of sight the moment war occurs. Look at the present market value of all these different things we call money. Our 6 per cent. bonds, having the longest time to run, are quoted at $1.24; our 5 per cent. bonds, at $1.14 to $1.18. All our interest-bearing debt is valued from its rate of interest and the length of time it runs. Our non-interest-bearing debt, having the property of money, is worth to-day eighty-six cents in gold. The national-bank note should be quoted at one fraction of a per cent. less. Our gold coin is the par standard; but the moment it crosses the frontier it is, like the other things, a commodity. Our silver halves and quarters and smaller coin were debased so as to be 7 per cent. below the standard of our gold before the late decline in silver. Some time ago we stopped coining American dollars of the standard of fineness fixed by law, and issued a coin which was really not a coin, but a commodity of great fineness and weight, the trade-dollar. They then sold for $1.25 in greenbacks, when greenbacks stood as they do now, but were not really worth so much. They are now worth $1.07. They were chiefly exported to such countries as China and Japan. were supposed to be a coin of world-wide acceptance; and yet there was no proposition to resume in them.

If to-day, with gold at $1.14\frac{1}{2}$, we should by taxation or selling bonds cancel our non-interest-bearing debt, it would take sixty millions to equalize values. It would make every debtor pay 14 per cent. more than he owes, and give that much to every creditor. It would confuse and prostrate business; and the conversion of four hundred and twenty millions of Government notes into interest-bearing bonds would place an additional mortgage on the bones and sinews of mil

To show that I do not overstate the case, I quote the proposition of the New York Chamber of Commerce, laid on my desk:

13. In the mean time it appears to be essential to reduce the volume of "legal-tenders" in one of two ways: Either by funding the excess of three hundred millions into 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds, or by the imposition of a duty on tea and coffee, (under a special enactment for this special purpose,) the whole yield of which shall be applied forthwith to the cancellation of legal-tenders; the law to continue in force till all are destroyed.

They deliberately propose a tax on tea and coffee, the luxuries of the poor, which shall be continued until the whole four hundred and twenty millions is wrung from an already too highly taxed people. They propose to devote these funds as a special provision to aid the moneyed interest; and I am amazed that they should have the effrontery to propose more of such legislation. Let the money-dealer stand like the other creditors of the Government.

Let it be known and understood that no forced efforts for contrac-tion can be maintained. To provide by desperate expedients to re-sume on a certain day is a proposition doomed to confusion and de-Until our natural prosperity carries us there, we cannot stay Gold, which has thus no proper relation to the real values of the country, would be driven from it, and after, by improper sacrifices, forcing our paper to par it would immediately decline again, as would all our credit. Business would be fearfully injured by the transition, and all our industries paralyzed for want of a proper circulating medium.

The proposition of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is a remarkable one. It is, in brief, that Government shall hoard gold until it has in the Treasury 30 per cent. of the legal-tender circulation, and that the interest on the bonds held as security for national-bank notes shall be held until it reaches 30 per cent. of their This on the seven hundred and thirty millions would be two hundred and twenty millions. The gentleman from Illinois has not indicated where that amount of coin is to come from. The has not indicated where that amount of coin is to come from. The whole country has not half that much gold now. If it was possible to get it, and thus lock it up uselessly in the Treasury, this would be a fearful contraction. When the Government ceased to scatter out the gold it gathers in, where would importers obtain the gold to pay customs? Instead of diminishing the price of gold, it would rise fearfully, and our paper would fall 50 per cent. Resumption under such interests of the country and the business in the country and the busi circumstances would bring ruin on the business interests of the coun-

While law cannot fix standards of value, it can terribly disturb them. Laws may be framed to aid producing labor, which is the only honest standard of wealth, or to do it almost irreparable mischief. Of that character was the so-called resumption act of last winter. Let me here state that the bill in question was in its incep-tion, purpose, and character an organized hypocrisy. Those who really favored the measure, commended it to their opponents as an inflation measure; those who opposed it, denounced it as contraction; and those who had it in charge, said it would appreciate our paper money toward par in gold, that gold speculation would cease, and our credit as a nation begin to be vindicated.

The result of that operation is before the country. I question if any thinking man at that time who was at all familiar with the subject believed that it would do much good. I should not wish to be so harsh as to say that its least zealous supporter expected that it would prove to be such a Pandora's box, full of mischief. Gold when that bill passed stood at $1.09. After nine months of the experiment it had risen to $1.17\frac{1}{2}, and is still 6\frac{1}{2} per cent. above what it was when the bill became a law. Our credit is relatively lower in the market. It has not, therefore, succeeded in this its chief purpose. has contracted the circulation. The theory was and the ostensible purpose of the bill to issue ten millions of national-bank notes for every eight millons of legal-tenders canceled. This it has not done. While new national-bank notes have been issued, the amount actually withdrawn is twice as great as that which has been issued. When the resumption act passed, the fractional currency outstanding was near fifty millions. In October it had been reduced to little more than Since then some four or five millions have been printed and signed, I cannot say re-issued; it has not gone into the circulation of the country. It is of course borne among the assets of the Treasury as the Treasurer of the United States informed me; has simply been boxed up and is in the Treasury unsunned and unused. For all practical purposes it might as well never have existed.

I have obtained the best estimates I could as to the exact amount of the contraction. I have carefully searched for the information wherever it could be expected to be found, and have painfully realized that statistics in our day are anything but an exact science. Take the figures of the Treasurer and Comptroller and put them all together and you will find a nominal contraction of about twenty-five millions, but the real contraction is more than fifty millions, nearly one-seventh of the entire volume of legal-tender, fractional currency, and national-bank notes at the time of the passage of the act. Besides the real contraction it has caused immense sums to be locked up in the banks, not for want of demand but for want of that confidence impaired by the resumption act. Workshops and factories are closed, laborers are idle, business is paralyzed. Country merchants are afraid to buy. The farmers and mechanics are unable to buy clothing, shoes, and other things they urgently need, because they cannot, at living prices, sell the food and labor which those who make the shoes and clothing still the food and labor which those who make the shoes and crouning sum more urgently need. At this stage our modern economist steps forward. "O," he says, "we have been too extravagant. We have been too enterprising. We have built too many houses, and towns, and cities. We have built too many railroads. We have run riot in carcities. We have built too many ratifoads. We have run riot in carriages and musical instruments, and patent plows, and reapers, and thrashers. We dress too fine, we eat too luxuriantly. We must rethrashers. We dress too fine, we eat too luxuriantiy. We must be trench. We have developed new countries too rapidly. Arrest the pachine-shops, workshops, iron horse, stop the water-wheel. Put the machine-shops, workshops, and manufactories on half time." Strip the nation of the benefit of one-fourth of its only real wealth—labor. Go on with this absurd philosophy, and its legitimate end is to carry us back to the spear and the wigwam.

These are the vicious fruits of this resumption bill; and if the members of this House read the lesson aright, if they approach the evil in an honest, candid spirit, if they come unawed by the power of money, and thrusting disdainfully behind them the appeal of the moneyholder to increase the power and value of his wealth, if they approach the subject fortified by the experience of the past and a sincere desire to serve the whole people, those we have the honor to represent on this floor will have profound cause to be grateful.

The resumption act has therefore been no remedy. What will be? That is the question the country asks this House. One party says Raise the standard of values, so that we will get more for our money. Another says "Lower the standard of values, so that we will pay less on our debts." A third party says "Neither raise nor sink the stand ard of values by artificial means, but let natural business and natural prosperity appreciate our notes to par. Then, as we increase in wealth our creditors will increase in wealth."

I do not underestimate the great difficulties involved in the question. I must confess that I approach them with profound diffidence. I spoke briefly on the subject in the first session of last Congress. I prepared myself with many facts at its second session, but withheld them and remained silent, deeply impressed with the magnitude of the subject. I should prefer now to listen to older legislators, but I have listened in vain for an impartial and unbiased statement of the question on the other side. I do not doubt the integrity of any speaker, nor would I detract from the evidence of the great ability of some of the speeches themselves. My estimate of party bias and the leanings of local and narrow interests may be incorrect. This is a problem which involves the happiness and prosperity of forty millions of people, and it implores us to rise if we can out of the pool of party politics to the plane of statesmen. It is in no sense a party measure. Neither democrats nor republicans have inscribed "hard" or "soft" money upon their banners. No man or interest or city has the right to make this the shibboleth of party. I, sir, yield in devotion to the republican party to no man. I have rocked its cradle and been willing to share its fortunes in victory or defeat, but I have served the party of freedom too long to see it become the slave of the money-changer without at least my earnest protest. As this is an open question in our party, I have been willing to concede to others the independence I assert for myself. All platforms and all parties are based on a spirit of compromise. I do not expect to have a platform molded exactly to suit me or those I represent. I do expect to fight under a platform the best that can be agreed upon, and so far as it does not ask me to violate a plain fundamental principle of right and wrong I expect to support it.

I therefore entreat members on this side of the Chamber carefully to examine the position into which there is an attempt to force them. Certain money interests are striving to take both parties by the throat. They care for neither. They hold the money centers of the East, and with them are many of the metropolitan and illustrated papers, some of which doubtless have received subsidies. I am willing, however, to concede that most of them are governed either by honest opinions or by the prevailing interest in the communities where they are located. I am proud also to be able to say that all over the land there is a press fearless, unbiased, independent in its utterances. I am proud of it for the honor and character of our common country. I am proud of it as an old journalist, jealous of the honest fame of the newspaper press. And yet this battle of the press for forced contraction and the destruction of the Government notes has been fought in an uncandid and treacherous spirit. Their opponents are misrepresented and lampooned. They are set forth as the champions of dishonest money, the defenders of broken promises, the enemies of public faith. They are caricatured as blockheads and insulted as knaves. Appeals are made for "honest money," for national faith, for stability; and under these pretensions we find deft devices to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; and the modern Shylock, the Shylock of to-day, prates about religion and morals, and appeals to national and individual conscience to fill his money-bags.

The object of all this war is the destruction of the Government notes, legal-tender, and fractional currency. To-day we have four hundred and twenty millions of those notes. As long as we have them the money-changers cannot control the financial world. The scepter of commerce is not in the hands of bankers. Against this money of the people they urge a bitter, unscrupulous, and implacable war.

I do not in one iota distort or misrepresent the case. They have enslaved part of the press, and carry on a fierce attack upon those who dare to vindicate the rights of the people. They have influenced many honest journals to sympathize with them. Not content with that, they have crept into the conventions of both parties and tried to frame platforms. Under such manipulations the platforms of both parties on this issue are as "ring-streaked, speckled, and spotted" as the flock of Jacob. Have they made parties? No, sir. Have they enslaved parties? They have attempted it. There never was an assumption that so insulted the independence of all American politics. There never was an interest before that came to this House with the insinuation that we were unworthy of the confidence of those who trusted us. There never was an insult so great as that which supposed that the American Congress could be hustled or dragooned.

Those who vindicate the rights of labor against money are traduced. Look at the case of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] the oldest member of this House. His personal integrity not even his enemies dare question. A laborious worker; you and I have seen him indefatigably laboring for what he deemed the best interests of his constituents and his country. Coming from a city where the moneyed interests are very strong, he is yet the fearless champion of the people. How does he fare. The moneyed interests, their tools and claquers, pour on his head every epithet of reproach. Unable to answer, they attempt to destroy by ridicule. He is charged with being false to his party by men who have scarcely learned how to be true to it.

Ah! sir, this is no new thing in history. Money and power have ever organized to put their feet on the necks of the champions of the people. They have always been able to buy bad men to traduce and weak ones to echo their shout. Go back through all history and you will find it. All along the shores of time are its evidences scattered among the wrecks of nations:

Such venal mobs were had for hire
Among the loyal Greeks,
Such varlets still were paid to hoot,
While brave Licinus speaks;
Where'er down Tiber garbage floats,
The greedy pike you see,
'And wheresee'er such lords are found,
Such varlets still will be.

I have said that the contraction of fifty millions of currency under the resumption bill has paralyzed business, and instead of appreciating our paper to gold has raised gold many per cent. If, therefore, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Tarbox] observed, a nominal contraction of twenty-five millions and a real contraction of fifty millions could raise the price of gold 5 or 6 per cent., how much would the contraction of seven hundred and thirty millions raise it?

It is useless to say that contraction did not produce this result. It did produce it. It created in various ways an additional demand for gold; and if any man supposes that by creating an additional demand you can lower the price, he is only fit for a situation in the asylum across the Eastern Branch.

Our currency to-day of both kinds is a little less than seven hundred and forty millions. The contraction wiseacres say it is too much. Is any man stupid enough to believe if there had not been a demand for that much it would have been in circulation? If it is wanted, it pays; if it does not pay, those who have the national-bank notes can withdraw them, get their bonds, and go into something else. There is no law here above the law of supply and demand. It will be observed that the one vital element of paper money is confidence. Confidence can only exist and flourish where it is deserved. The highest authority on banking (McLeod) says that "The simplest and most perfect form of currency is that which represents nothing but transferable debt." The more barbarous nations have used metals, or things supposed to have an intrinsic value, as the medium of exchanges. The first step in advance was to have them stamped by government and a certain current value in each country given them. Here the line is crossed between commodity and currency. You may put five dollars' worth of gold or silver in a medal and precisely the same amount in stamped coin. The latter has the power of currency by law and circulates at a fixed price, and is accepted, because everybody knows it will be accepted. The medal never sells for its value, and can only command a sale by the power of melting it down again. As nations advance to the highest intellectual standards, they use paper money. That is of many kinds, including not only paper currency, but bills of exchange.

Sir John Lubbuck, the learned London banker, estimates that in London 95 per cent. of all business exchanges are made by means of ordinary bank transactions, checks, drafts, and bills of exchange, a little over 3 per cent. in paper currency, and less than 2 per cent. in coin. It has been assumed that the same rule would apply to business in all highly civilized countries, but I would call attention to an important fact: While that rule of business may apply to great centers of trade, it does not and cannot apply to remote localities. Take our Western States, for instance. There the farmers, mechanics, and, in short, the bulk of the laborers East and West, have nothing to do with banks. Not one in twenty of them ever have a bank account. Each bushel of wheat and each pound of pork requires just so much money in currency or coin to buy it. The farmer when he sells a load of wheat generally spends part of it, and takes the rest home with him. He plays banker for himself. He has other purposes in view, for which he reserves the money to be used as occasion requires. He has confidence that the money of his government will be good, and thus immense amounts in the aggregate are locked up. But when you attempt to increase the value of currency by contracting its volume, he is the first man you touch and the first to suffer. You take away from him the power of exchanging produce for other commodities, and they have either to be sold at vastly reduced rates or remain on his hands, even while others are starving for the want of them. There is another strange misstatement. It was intimated that if gold supplanted paper farmers would get a gold dollar instead of a paper one for their wheat. They would get nothing of the kind. It is the foreign demand fixes and regulates the value. At certain points it pays to ship it, and the decline ceases. If wheat is $1 in greenbacks its price is about eighty-six cents in gold. That is the value, and, although the stan lards differ, the value is the same. I will tell you what this change

There is another piece of clap-trap that has deceived a great many honest men, and confounded a great many more. To those who either desire inflation or who resist contraction, it is said derisively, "You want more money; do you suppose that they are going to make it at the Treasury and shovel it out to you? You can get no money unless you have something to give for it." That derisive sneer does not for a moment touch the question. The most valuable article ever offered in the market of the world is human labor, for it produces everything else. Hundreds of thousands of mechanics and laborers are to-day else. Hundreds of thousands of mechanics and laborers are to-day idle because the money magnates of the country have contrived to confuse and disturb the medium of exchanges. Their families are pinched and suffering, in some cases starving—starving for the food that some farmers in the West are burning to-day because they cannot find a market for it. The suffering laborers of the earth rise and plead for that patriotism which surely is not banished from this House. The ghastly figure of pauperism presents itself as the coming problem the American statesman must meet. Let me say that it is a thousand times cheaper and ten thousand times better to prevent pauperism than to provide for it. To those who are bent on artificial and forced contraction, let me say that in the short-sighted desire to add to your own gain you may defeat your own object. In your greed you would kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Three hundred thousand idle workmen stand appealing to you. Will you say to them with a sneer: "Do you want more money? If you have anything to give for it you will get it." They have offered their labor, which is all they have, and which is the most valuable commercial article in Christendom.

Let me give another case. When I was a boy in Illinois I can re-

Let me give another case. When I was a boy in Illinois I can remember the crash in the State and local banks that came before 1840. Nothing could be worse than these banks were, but their downfall left the country almost without circulation. The little there was consisted chiefly of old Mexican and Spanish coin. A system of universal store credit prevailed, at rates ruinous to the poor man. Wheat was sold for twenty-five cents per bushel in trade; pork a cent and a half; a horse from twenty-five to fifty dollars. These prices were in trade credit or store goods. I knew a farmer of old Perry County who needed to raise $100 to pay for eighty acres of land on which part of his farm stood. He allowed another man to enter his cattle-pen and take twenty cows and calves for that $100. "O," says the money-dealer, "if you have anything to give for money you will get it." He had something to give, and he gave it.

I care nothing about the pretexts made. Appeals to pay gold for greenbacks on a certain day are coupled with the assumption that public faith demands it. They cry, "Honest money!" They laugh at the "rag-baby." All these cover the real purpose, which is to shape legislation so as to increase the value of their money. It is useless to deny it; and if they are such advocates of "honesty," let them honestly avow it. That is the real proposition. Strip it of all its pretentions and hypocritical veils, and then having it before us naked and plain, we can see what claims it has upon us.

It is demanded of us that we take immediate steps to resume specie universal store credit prevailed, at rates ruinous to the poor man,

It is demanded of us that we take immediate steps to resume specie It is demanded of us that we take immediate steps to resume specie payment. Can we resume? Can we resume at the period fixed by the resumption bill? No. We have in legal-tender and fractional currency four hundred and twenty millions. There is not one hundred and twenty millions of coin in the whole country, and only thirteen millions in the Treasury. As long as there is a difference between our paper and gold we cannot resume, for we at once offer inducements to draw all the gold from the country. The attempt under such circumstances would be a failure, and the failure very disastrous. It would only offer a field for money-sharks to fatter on the It would only offer a field for money-sharks to fatten on the ruin of business and property.

If the effect would be bad on the legal tender, what would it be on the national-bank notes? The theory of the resumption bill was that for every eight millions of legal tender destroyed, ten millions of national-bank notes would be issued. Now, sir, while eleven millions of national-bank notes have been issued, twice that amount of old national-bank notes have been surrendered and withdrawn from circulation. That is just what was to be expected. The only wonder is that any new national-bank circulation should have been applied for, and this can only be accounted for under one of two theories: either those who did knew nothing about their business, or they believed a wiser Congress would follow that which enacted the resumption law, and repeal it.

Let me impress the fact that while the legal-tender notes can do without the national-bank notes, the latter cannot do without the legal tender. They are redeemable in legal tender. The volume of legal tender has always been greater than the volume of nationalbank notes. There was, consequently, always the power in the country to redeem them. The propositions of the money-dealers are two-fold: First, to withdraw the money of the people, the legal tender, and substitute it with national-bank notes; or, second, to take off the tax, which taxed private and State banks out of existence, and go back to the old bank system

I say that one of these two is inevitable, because our legal-tender and national-bank notes amount to about seven hundred and forty millions, and no sane man proposes to substitute for that volume of circulation a little over one hundred millions of coin, which is already doing full duty.

Now for the first proposition. I have said that the national-bank notes cannot do much good without the legal tender. The resumption act proved that. Let us imagine, if such a thing were possible, the Government currency all withdrawn and the seven hundred and the Government currency an withdrawn and the seven induced and forty millions of currency represented by national-bank notes. Of the specie in the country not more than thirty millions could by any possibility get into the hands of the national banks. Does any man suppose that to be a safe banking basis, or that a resumption of specie payments made in that way would last two weeks? We are aware that the national banks can pay their obligations in legal tender. What are their obligations? Not only their outstanding notes, but their deposits, which are thrice as great. Every man knows that no bank is broken by a run on its notes, but the depositors, who are immediately around it on the first alarm, take all the money it has got and break the bank. The paper of the bank is secured, however, by Government bonds. It is safe in the end, but how about realizing? Let a universal panic come on the system I have described, and the bonds held are sold to redeem the notes. Suppose two-thirds of the banks should go with a crash, where are we to get the five hundred millions of coin to redeem with? Shall we get it in Europe? Europe has always been a buyer of our coin, not a seller. By the best estimates I can obtain the national banks of England, France, Germany, Austria, and the Netherlands had about six hundred millions of coin but a few years ago. The Bank of France alone has upward of six hundred millions of legal tender afloat, and the volume of her par paper is twice as great. By the most careful calculations of the European bankers five hundred and fifty millions is required to be held to make their banking business safe. The other fifty millions is the margin or basis on which they do all their other business. To take one-half of it from them, or twenty-five millions, would paralyze the business and industries of Europe. We simply cannot get it. The attempt would result in their taking what we now possess.

Now, where are our bonds? A mistaken idea prevails that they are largely held abroad. Such is not the case. After careful investigation the matter can only be approximated. On consultation with the accomplished Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, I learn that less than one-fourth, and probably not more than one-fifth, are held in all foreign countries, leaving the great bulk of them in our own country. Where are they? The national banks for circulation and country. Where are they? The national banks for circulation and deposits have about five hundred millions of them. The savings-banks and insurance companies have more. Here we account for one-half of the interest-bearing debt. More than one hundred millions of the interest-bearing debt. ions may be said to act as money, and crosses and recrosses the ocean by every steamer. If the margin of difference in price favors their going the other way, these bonds go instead of specie, and if the margin offers inducements to come this way they return. Then large amounts are held by executors, because by putting funds in United States bonds they are safe. Immense sums are held by private bankers and hoarded by individuals. One able official gave it as his opinion that at least sixteen hundred millions of our securities are held in this country, Of course that is a mere approximation, but it is undoubtedly near the truth.

If we are to sell more of our bonds in Europe than all the world has now, what are they to give us for them? During the war they could take them and give us Army supplies, our paper going at a fearful reduction. I have shown that they cannot give us gold. They bought during the war more bonds than they kept, for it was found more profitable to dispose of them here than there. commodities of production, wheat, cotton, tobacco, and other articles, we sell them this year sixty millions more than we buy from them. They are therefore not able to buy any bonds from us, and will consequently not buy them. All the laws we could make on the subject contemplating such a probability would be simply absurd. To calculate and depend on it would certainly be disastrous.

Where, then, are we to obtain the specie on which to resume? Some say, "Our mines produce vast quantities, let us stop its exportation."

I question if a more stupid idea was ever conceived. The product of our mines in gold and silver has been rapidly increasing, owing to the use of improved machinery and the application of new and intelligent processes. I do not believe the product this year will fall short of $75,000,000; certainly not less than seventy millions. of $75,000,000; certainly not less than seventy millions. Its value you will observe comes from offering it in the markets of the world. That value is rapidly decreasing. Especially is this the case with silver. In the past five years it is estimated to have decreased in value 10 per cent., and when I say this, I mean as measured by gold. So alarming is this that Austria and Germany have demonetized it. Even the oriental nations, where five hundred millions of people have steadily been taking our silver, are getting tired of it. They no longer afford a sufficient market, and send their financial savans over here to study and initiate our greenback system. The day we by law, if such a thing were possible, stop the exportation of the product of our mines, that day we would cease to be able to pay the interest on our general and local bonds held abroad, and that day our specie would cease to have any fixed value. We attempted under the resumption act to resume in a depreciated silver, for before the decline in prices, and while gold and silver had their equal rates, we debased the silver coin, our halves, quarters, and dimes being reduced 7 per cent. top of that comes this depreciation, from overproduction, of 10 per cent. in the past five years. It will be seen that if we coin our fractional silver according to the standards of the present, it would be actually worth less than greenbacks. Did any one ever hear of such a scheme for equalizing values and redeeming the honor of the nation? Nothing like it was ever heard of since the vending of wooden nut-megs. It is said that the very street-car conductors in San Francisco discount the fractional silver currency 10 per cent., and we can imagine a grocer who has disposed of three red herrings computing the discount on the dime he receives for them. We have since the passage of the resumption act accumulated fifteen millions of silver to make into small coins. We have already lost from two to three hundred thousand dollars on it while we are haggling for a few hundred dollars on a consulate, and if the depreciation continues as rapidly as it has begun, nobody knows how we can ever utilize it, unless we convert it into a magnificent statue modeled after the author of the resumption bill. I called on Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, some two weeks ago, and got a statement that silver of the American coin standard was in New York worth 3 per cent. two mills less than legal-tenders. I called on him the other day and got another. Last Saturday American coin silver in New York was 4 per cent. two mills under greenbacks, and would buy just that much less gold. We have lost in two weeks $160,000 on the fifteen millions of silver bullion we have in the Treasury. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RAN-DALL] in the bill be brought in the other day proposes to buy thirty millons more on a falling market.

Let us examine the case of France. She has six hundred millions of legal tender afloat. It is to-day at par, but the legal-tender act is not repealed. M. Leon Say, their finance minister, in his last budget gives various reasons why the legal-tender act should not be repealed. The moneyed interests of England and Germany have demanded the repeal of the French legal-tender act, and they denounce it as dis-honest just as the bankers do here. They say France has no excuse for it, as their legal tender has been at par with gold for several years. Not so thinks M. Say, the French minister. He will not consent to its repeal, and does not even give assurance that he will in the two years which had been fixed for its repeal.

The French system of finance is full of instruction for us. She has six hundred millions of legal-tender notes of the national bank and twice that much of par money with a less population than ours, and to-day furnishes the remarkable spectacle of having more gold at her disposal and in the vaults of her banks than any nation in Europe.

I have already said that France to-day has more gold and silver coin than any nation in Europe. It is but a little time since she ceased paying her enormous war indemnity. How did she get that coin back? I will first say that she did not get it by selling her bonds. People who buy the bonds of other nations do it because they have money to loan. When gold is scarce and rising, as in Germany, they do not sell it for bonds. And I would say to the gentlemen from Ill. do not sell it for bonds. And I would say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison] that France did not get it from a tax on tea and coffee. Long before they had got half what they now have the people would have ceased drinking either. They got it from their industries. I have observed among the statistics of the past year that France then exported three hundred millions more of her products than she imported of the products of other people. That is where she got it. How was she able to do this? She has taken care of her industries. She has manufactures of linen, damask, laces, silk, velvets, satins, corsets, carpets, tapestries, porcelain, gloves, watches, precious stones, guns, jewelry, and many other articles of bijoutry, of which the people of this country have no conception, besides her more substantial productions. Her humblest worker, if he has a little property, can get money to turn it to account-borrow half its value at 5 per cent. It does not destroy his business to do that. If we will take the same course, we can do the same thing. Our resources are more abundant than theirs; but we must never turn the ingenious laborer and producer, bound hand and foot, to the tender mercies of the Does legal tender drive out gold? No, sir. How is it with Gernany? One would think that the immense war indemnities paid to many? her by France would have secured to her great money power. What are the facts? To-day the rash system of coinage she has launched upon is checked for want of gold. She seeks to draw it from France. Does she? No! France draws it from Germany. Germany is undergoing a fearful business prostration. In obedience to the same power which demanded resumption of us, she has attempted a rigid gold basis. All bank-notes under $25 have been prohibited. Owing to the decline in silver it has been demonetized, and to-day the nation that received ten hundred millions of gold but a few years ago cannot get one-fifth of it to complete this gold venture on which she has embarked. Her business is paralyzed; her merchants fast becoming bankrupt; her laborers idle. The victor of Sedan stands broken before French finance.

France refuses to repeal her legal-tender act, for she has the control of the financial situation, all the industries of France are employed. Besides the Bank of France there are other banks, such as the Crédit Foncier. This latter bank, which is not properly a bank of issue, like most of them, is under complete control of the minister of finance. It loans only on real estate, at a maximum interest of 5 per cent., advancing only on a first lien one-half of what the property is worth. It is not allowed to make any other use of its money. It is governed or supervised by officials, and must keep at least two hundred millions so loaned to retain its privileges

No man who has ever examined the subject dares deny that credit is one of the most important levers which can be set in motion to raise the condition of the working classes. Where a mechanic, by the aid of credit and enterprise, can be made into a master workman, and laborer into a systemizer of labor, an immense blessing is conferred. The door to the highest places is open to industry, skill, and enterprise. Those who are willing to strive, and who have the nerve and brain, have the power to make themselves far more useful.

Under a paper-currency system France has thriven as no other nation in Europe has thriven. The golden decade of progress in our own Republic began in 1862 with legal-tender. In that time we built our Pacific railroads and thousands of miles of other roads. Cities grew as they had never grown before. All labor was employed. Be-ginning with Secretary McCulloch's Fort Wayne speech, a new condition of affairs was inaugurated. Several years after the war closed we had been paying enormous sums for bounties, supplies, and provisions; these were really war debts. At the same time we were paying off our bonded debt at a rate that would have extinguished it in thirty years. This was to appreciate the value of all of our securities. The industries of the country were burdened too heavily, and the tax-gatherer was brought face to face with diminishing revenues. The motive and the power which prompted such action has never ceased its work. It is England and Germany and the money-dealers in our own country who demand the destruction of our legal-tender

Let us remember that one-sixth of our entire debt is non-interestbearing. It is that which is sought to be destroyed. Our legal ten-der has been denounced on this floor as "an infamous fraud and No business man of sense believes any thing of the worthless rags." kind. France, during her late terrible war, borrowed $294,000,000 from the Bank of France. She borrowed it at 1 per cent. per annum. Was this patriotism? Not at all; it was simply business. As an additional inducement an amount of legal-tenders were authorized to be issued equal to amounts borrowed. In other words, the nation and the bank shared the profits of the paper money, and the bank was required to pay from 2 to 3 per cent. of the interests such loans would otherwise have commanded to the nation on the money the latter borrowed from them.

We have been more prodigal of our credits which have the power of acting as money. We have doubled the value of the bonds. We pay 5 and 6 per cent. interest on them. We have taken them for safekeeping and issued 90 per cent. of national-bank paper on them, which has the same power as legal tender, for it is redeemable in it. If we had charged the banks for the privilege 3 per cent. of the interest we owe on the bonds we would have done what France did. That is the difference between the French and American creditor.

Let us look at the rates of interest. I say nothing of call loans on first-class paper, which can fix no values. If we take real-estate loans in the eastern cities, they run from 8 to 10 per cent.; in the West, from 12 to 24. In Russia, a progressive country, but where they are very deficient in a banking system, the interest is 12 per cent. to 30, and the farmers and laborers are in very miserable circumstances, unable to improve their condition or use their resources. In France the rate for such loans is 5 per cent.; in England a little higher. There is at present no means of even approximating the rates

It is needless to point out the disastrous effects of the high rates of interest in our country. Why do they exist? It is said that a national bond, paid every six months, will always bring 1 or 2 per cent. more than first-class paper on time loans. The holders of our 6 per cent. gold bonds at the present price of gold get $6.87 interest on each $100. That is not all. We have exempted them from local taxation. That is nearly 3 per cent. more, which makes close on to 10 per cent. can, therefore, tell at what price local securities and bonds will sell, the latter being taxable. We can tell, having fixed such standards, how much interest trades-people and mechanics must pay for money borrowed on time. The rates of interest to the latter class of borrowers had been decreasing up to the passage of the resumption act. They would have decreased still further but for the locking up of money and paralyzation that measure caused. It is evident that we are paying more interest than the market asks. Our six per cents are at $1.23 and $1.26, which at their real value is little more than five shows that the same values bring about the same interest, the character of the bonds considered. If we reduced them in interest, they would gradually fall to par. In other words, I do not see how a bond to run long time issued by the Government at par should require to pay more than 3.65 per cent. interest, even without the privilege of being interconvertible into legal-tender.

I have not the time, and do not propose now to discuss the project so ably and eloquently argued by my friend from Pennsylvania, that is, the issuing of 3.05 bonds, at par convertible into legal tender, and reconvertible at will. The scheme is not without merit. If it is simply to supersede the national-bank notes, it is infinitely better. I would call attention to the fact that France demands half the curwould call attention to the fact that France demands half the current rate of interest for the privilege of issuing legal tender. We can make no exact calculation, but we are within bounds in saying that this legal-tender power at par would at least bring the 3.65 bonds up to 5 per cent. At that rate such bonds ought to bring from $1.14 to $1.18. Now, the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a laudable one. It is to enable legal-tenders to be transferred to interest-bearing bonds at par. The other proposition, to make them convertible and reconvertible into currency, is a very different one. The advantage would be to give a more fixed and definite value to logal. advantage would be to give a more fixed and definite value to legal tender, and to accomplish that without unnecessarily interfering with business is one of the best things we can do. When, on the suggestion of Mr. Chase, the law was repealed which authorized the funding at par of legal-tenders into five-twenties, it was simply because these securities rose above the price of legal-tenders. Since that time the legal tender has not been "an orphan among us." Legal-tenders have, with a few exceptional cases, steadily appreciated in value.

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is the policy of our Government to keep our bonds as near par as possible, so that the legal tender can be funded in them. The way to do that is to fund our bonds at a lower rate of interest the moment it can be done. The attempt to fix the value of legal tender and bonds by law would be of doubtful success and, upon the whole, a questionable expedient; but there can be no difference of opinion as to the policy of keeping our interest-bearing bonds as near par as possible by reducing the rates of interest, when it can be easily done, without incurring too much risk of confusion in the fluctuations of our bonds. People could then keep their funds in legal tender or interest-bearing bonds as they pleased.

The power to convert and re-convert at will gives the power to contract and inflate into the hands of the bankers. They, of course, would be governed to some extend by the laws of trade, but it would be by no means a safe addition to their power. In point of fact these 3.65's would act as money as the old compound-interest notes did. The interest accruing would not be computed. They would float as money until the interest was worth more than their value as currency, and the bankers would collect and hold them just as they did the compound-interest notes. The interest would not be for poor people but for the bankers.

We must never conceal from ourselves the fact that we can only sell 3.65's, or five per cents, or any other securities, to people who want them and have anything to give us for them. I think I have de-monstrated that we cannot sell any large volume of bonds for gold in Europe. Even if we wanted more of their commodities than they do Europe. Even if we wanted more of their commodities than they do of ours the expedient of buying them with our bonds would of necessity be limited and temporary. We could sell our legal tender for 3.65 bonds if we gave the buyers power to make it money, but the legal tender gives us all these advantages already. People can buy bonds now with legal tender if they will pay their selling-price for them, and they do so now when they want them.

The real secret of the demand for the contraction and final extinctions of the contraction and final extinctions.

tion of the legal-tender notes is to increase the value of money, its purchasing power and interest, and to give bankers the control of the money market. I have already endeavored to show that the rate of interest is now too high for safe and healthy business, so we do not want to take steps to advance it. Neither do we wish to transfer the power of controlling paper money from the Government to the bankrers. Neither do we wish to reduce the volume of the present currency beyond the point where the laws of trade fixed it. The national-bank note could have been issued to greater extend if any bankers wanted them, and I would call attention to the fact that at the passage of the resumption act eighteen millions less of legal tender was issued than could have been issued under the law as it was supposed to stand then.

These things, therefore, we do not want to do. What do we want These things, therefore, we do not want to do? What do we want to do? The first thing we want to do is to repeal the resumption act. I wish to warn this House that an attempt may be made to couple this with the adoption of some other measure. Whatever other measures may have to commend them to our judgment, they ought to be considered separately. The money interest may have some influence here; but I entreat the members of this body not to permit that interest to say that it will not let us repeal the resumption act unless we give them one they like better. How did they pass that measure? Those who had the bill in charge got the assent of the House to make it a special order, with the positive assurance that time and opportunity would be given for debate and amendments. How did they keep that pledge? They came before the House, and the then chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, after a few apologetic words, moved the previous question. All appeals were treated with disdain. I am proud to say, sir, that it received no vote from me. I am also aware that many good men who did not like it and who had little confidence in it voted for it under a vague idea that "they must do something." That something has been before the country for more than a year, and is a monument to the folly of such ill-digested and hurried legislation. The money sharks wish us to consider this offspring of stupidity and broken promises a sacred obli-Laws made to protect the rights of labor are repealed without a thought; but every law that advances the interest of money is

There are two facts connected with gold and paper as currency that are worth considering. It is estimated that 2 per cent. per annum of bank paper is worn out, lost, and destroyed while in use. On the three hundred and fifty millions of national-bank notes, that is a snug seven millions a year for the bankers. On the four hundred and the transfer of level tenders and freetiered surrence it is not in the paper. twenty millions of legal-tender and fractional currency, it is an income of eight millions and a half, deducting the slight expense of Printing, to the Government.

How is it with gold? It is estimated by statisticians that gold in active circulation loses 1 per cent. by friction every year. I think this too high an estimate. If it was possible to have the whole of our circulation of seven hundred and fifty millions in gold, there would be wasted seven millions and a half annually; for we would have to buy gold to replace it, and in one or two hundred years the original

It is one of the most wonderful providences of God that thus prevents the permanent accumulation of gold. If we compute the enormous sums paid and used in ancient times, of which history gives us a record, we are amazed at what can have become of it. It has passed away in fragments so fine as to be undistinguishable, silted with the dust that covers ancient palaces and temples, yet so infinitesimally small as to defy the power of the god Mercury or even the grasp of human cupidity. The miser as he sits counting his hoard little thinks that his idolatry is frittering away his treasure. It could not be wrung from him by appeals to aid the struggling youth or hard-worked laborer. The wail of the unfortunate or the tear of the starving beggar could not draw a grain of it from him. He listens to its clinking with delight, for "the gold of the land of Havilah is good," and under that accursed gold worship the idol passes away. "He who sitteth in the heavens shall laugh."

There is an old tradition, or rather a piece of ancient history, which tells us that the Straits of Gibraltar were once much narrower, and that two great castles or temples guarded the pass, styled the Pillars of Hercules. Recent investigations show that the ruins of immense buildings lie buried sixty feet deep in the sea. On one of the temples stood a gigantic figure of the oft-repeated Hercules. turned to that western ocean beyond which lay the Atalantis of the ancients. The figure was molded in exquisite symmetry, springing life-like from the foot and stretching forward to grasp the golden life-like from the foot and stretching forward to grasp the golden apples of the Hesperides.

The myth pregnant with meaning was realized when an adventurer from Spain once more discovered the lost Atalantis. Gold was found there in great abundance. "The gold of the land of Havilah was good." Half of Europe was drunk with adventure. Discovery was considered a better title than possession, and robbery and murder were committed in unparalleled wholesale. Spain was enriched beyond all precedent by the plunder of ancient empires crumbling to decay. Neither the homes of the living nor the graves of the dead were safe. As the wealth of the natives failed to satisfy their rapacity, piracy and slavery were added to the accumulated horrors and ity, piracy and slavery were added to the accumulated horrors, and all Spain and her colonies had the seeds of moral corruption and ruin sowed in them.

At the time of the discovery of America by Columbus Spain was the only country in Europe that had a parliamentary body worthy of the omy country in Europe that at a partiamentary body worthy of the name. Her people had just driven the Moors from the peniusula. Gallant soldiers, accomplished women, and brilliant men were there. The college of savans at Seville in 1520 was perhaps as learned a body as ever assembled. Trades were organized into guilds. The nation was enterprising and industrious. But the seeds of destruction had

Industry was neglected in the thirst for gold; honest pursuits abandoned and forgotten. The politicians of that day soon discovered that the immense amount of gold they had obtained was floating out that the immense amount of gold they had obtained was floating out of the country for the articles they had ceased to produce at home. Then they adopted an expedient that has actually been proposed on this floor and passed a law prohibiting the exportation of gold. That was the turning-point of Spanish destiny. Having no other use for it, they manufactured it into rings and chains, and saints and angels, and candlesticks and crucifixes. Could not this new-born religious zeal save that perishing nation? Alas, even the candlesticks that gleamed under their wax tapers and the crosses so impiously reared were like the mice and emerges the Philistines put on the ark of the were like the mice and emerods the Philistines put on the ark of the covenant, for they were red with the blood of Manco Capac and Montezuma.

The career of Spain has ever since been downward. The dry-rot had smitten her timbers of state and moral leprosy infected the body had smitten her timbers of state and moral leprosy infected the body politic. Look at her to-day. She has become a fourth-class power. Torn by dissensions at home, her colonies mostly wrested from her; but whether wrested from her or not, the people she there planted seem to be branded with the curse of Cain. The Spanish power totters to an inglorious overthrow while footsteps of the progressing Auglo-Saxon are steadily advancing on its decadence and ruin.

The lesson is not without meaning to us. It tells us that labor, energy, enterprise, are the only true sources of wealth. In legislation to encourage and aid these lies our only prosperity. Laws made tion to encourage and aid these lies our only prosperity. Laws made in the interest of capital against labor did more to ruin ancient Rome than the Goths or the Huns. Let us therefore remember that, while we are just to all interests, it is our first duty to legislate for the moneyless workers of the earth, for there is no decay half so ruinous to the political fabric as that which begins at the bottom. It surely is not a dishonest task to see that the laborer gets a fair proportion of the wealth he produces, and that, in the process of measuring and exchanging that capital, the accumulations of labor get no more than their just amount. The cry that enterprise must be let alone is exchanging that capital, the accumulations of labor get no more than their just amount. The cry that enterprise must be let alone is the cry of the usurer when he is not permitted to wring the last cent from his unhappy victims. Money has always insisted on controlling the money interests of the world. It arrogates to itself all the profits of banking. For furnishing the necessary means of exchange it loans its debts at interest and it howls "dishonesty and bad faith" when the Government, which can do it far more safely, assumes the function. When the clauses of the Constitution in reference to issue function. When the clauses of the Constitution in reference to issuing paper money were pending it was agreed that States should re-linquish the right they had exercised to issue bills of credit. This can only be construed as a relinquishment from the States to the General Government. The debates as recorded in the Madison papers show a proposal was submitted to put this specifically in the Constitution. It was admitted by nearly all that such a power was a necessity, but was thought to be sufficiently covered by the other provisions. The objection to inserting it among conceded powers specifically was tersely stated by Mr. Morris, who said that "it might array all the moneyed interests in the country against the Constitution." This power to emit bills of credit which the States in entering the Union specifically relinquished was therefore vested in the General Government by the acts of acceptance.

It will be observed that all those who denounce the legal-tender as irredeemable promises never denounce issues of private bankers as irredeemable. The banks of London carry on business with 5 or 10 per cent. of specie, and are allowed to use these inflated promises as money for their own private emolument. So it is with our bankers. Look at the California system, so highly complimented by the gen-Look at the California system, so highly complimented by the gentleman from Maine. The Pacific coast States maintain a specie basis; that is, they pretend to. Last summer the Bank of California, the leviathan of the money power there, when a run was made on it, paid out $1,200,000, and broke. We observed that neither her correspondents nor her unparalleled resources could save her. She had floating in all kinds of liabilities $22,000,000. In other words, she was using as money her credit to twenty times the amount of her availusing as money her credit to twenty times the amount of her available coin. It is the infamous British system of banking we are trying -a system that gives to bankers and money men, not only the use of their capital, but of the credit which may be attached to it to use as money; a system which has created a moneyed aristocracy at the expense of a fearful pauperism and the degradation of labor; a system that stretches its magic hand to draw half the profits of honest labor, that stretches its magic hand to draw half the profits of honest labor, so rapacious and insatiable that it debases and even cripples the industry on which it feeds. The active mechanic or business man tries to borrow from those who are using their own debts as money. He borrows at a usurious rate of interest. He cannot see the deft machinery by which he is ground to powder. All labor, industry, and enterprise groans, but cannot see the system that organizes its oppressors. The whole question to-day is to take the power of regulating the value of money from the Government and give it to the bankers. The latter may have the press to abuse those who stand like iron. The latter may have the press to abuse those who stand like iron against them.

I do not need and I do not wish to underestimate the brain or patri-otism of the modern American. Many of our countrymen look envi-ously to the days when the fathers of the Government in founding it had an opportunity to earn immortality they think denied to us. A nobler opportunity is ours—to preserve and maintain the interests and dignity of honest labor. This is the only reliable pillar of the Republic. When we permit it to be assailed the Government crumbles with it. I invite you to its defense as the highest aspiration of patriotism, and trust and hope that a stern Spartan virtue standing in defense of labor against the insidious encroachments of money will dignify and ennoble the American Congress.

I urge, therefore—
First. The immediate and unconditional repeal of the resumption act, leaving other propositions to be separately determined.
Second. No artificial resumption; no taxation of tea and coffee, or the sale of bonds to withdraw legal tender. These are obnoxious measures in the moneyed interest, and no resumption can be maintained un-nres in the moneyed interest, and no resumption can be maintained until we gradually grow rich enough. Such a forced effort would drive all the gold from the country and set a million of laborers idle.

Third. To prepare as rapidly as possible to have our customs duties payable in legal tender. This is the only honest step we can take toward resumption. It will end gold speculation. Better buy gold to pay our interest. No destruction of the legal-tender note.

Fourth. To fix the sinking fund and all purchase of bonds in extinguishment of debt at not to exceed 1½ per cent. per annum. That will maintain our credit and is tax enough on our industries.

Fifth. To labor in all our legislation to fund in a debt, if possible will maintain our credit and is tax enough on our industries.

Fifth. To labor in all our legislation to fund in a debt, if possible 3.65, which could be kept at par. To call in our high-rate bonds as soon as we can, and offer gold or these three-sixty-fives at thirty years. With no demand for gold for customs they would be glad to take them, because when we get our paper to par they would lose on the high-priced bonds. We have this power. Let us keep it, and let us use all the funds we expend in reducing the debt to aid in funding our high-priced bonds into a lower rate.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should feel that I was untrue to myself and untrue to the honest, patriotic, and intelligent constituency I have the honor to represent, were I to remain silent and give no open expression to the views I entertain upon the great, important financial questions now largely agitating the public mind.

While my opinion may be of little public importance, yet as a humble Representative I desire here and now to enter my protest against the many propositions submitted by inflationists on this floor and elsewhere for the cure of our present financial difficulties.

That to a certain extent the industries of the country are embarassed, and in some cases nearly paralyzed. I shall not deny neither rassed, and in some cases nearly paralyzed, I shall not deny, neither shall I assert there are not want and distress among the laboring classes of the country. But the reason for these calamities is not found in the want of sufficient currency to meet the legitimate busibeen, since the crisis of 1873, millions of currency lying idle in the great commercial centers, which the owners would gladly employ or invest at a low rate of interest upon satisfactory security. Indeed, there never has been a time since the war, or in the history of the country, when currency in large quantities could be obtained at rates so low as in the year 1875. We have good authority for the statement, that the amount of currency lying idle in the banks of the country to-day is not less than $100,000,000, which cannot find profitable investment. This proves better than noisy declamation or fine-span theories that the want of sufficient currency is not the cause of this widespread depression in the business of the country. Were the circulation double the amount it is, no man could command any portion of it unless he had an equivalent to offer in exchange, and therefore the increase would be of no benefit. The trouble with our currency is that it has no fixed value; that it is irredeemable; that it is not money in the full meaning of that term, and cannot be converted into the only money known to the Constitution of the United States, gold and silver, without a discount varying from day to day by ten thousand control ing circumstances, some near and some remote.

It seems to me our friends who favor inflation entirely mistake the nature of money. A dollar is not an imaginary sum, the value of which cannot be determined, but is twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of gold nine-tenths fine, and is the unit or standard of values by which all other values are measured. The greenback derives its value from the promise on its face, made by the United States, to pay the bearer the sum there represented, in real money, the coin of the United States; and when the Government neglects or refuses to fulfill its promise, the greenback becomes depreciated, and if the promise be entirely repudiated, it becomes of no more value than the paper on which it is printed. The gold dollar is not a promise to pay, but absolute money, and has a fixed and certain value, which is not enhanced by the Government's authentication in stamping it in its own dies; while, on the other hand, all paper currency has value only as it is made the representative of something of real value. The greenback is now the representative of about eighty-six one hundredths of a gold dollar, and hence has not the purchasing power of real money, and never can have until it is convertible at the will of the holder into coin or its equivalent. Entertaining these views as I do, I am firm in the conviction that it is the duty of Congress so to legislate as to appreciate the value of the greenbacks and make them at the earliest possible moment equivalent to coin.

If I read history rightly, it was the intention of the framers of the legal-tender act to provide for their early redemption in coin, and not only was this their intention, but the act itself contained an express provision that this should be done. The first act authorizing the issue of legal-tenders became a law February 25, 1862, and was entitled-

An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States.

At this time the Government could not redeem its notes in coin, but could issue bonds upon its credit, and redeem in them. This act authorized the issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and provided for funding them into United States bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest payable in coin. The first notes issued under this act bore date March 10, 1862, upon the back of which was printed these words:

This note is a legal tender, for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and is exchangeable for United States 6 per cent. bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years.

Subsequent to this and on the 11th day of July, 1862, Congress passed an act authorizing a further issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tenders. This issue was not only convertible into gold bonds, but the Secretary of the Treasury was given authority to pay these notes in coin, both principal and interest, if he deemed it for the advantage of the Government so to do.

This brief statement shows most conclusionly that the first $200.

This brief statement shows most conclusively that the first $300,-000,000 of legal-tenders issued were made convertible into bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest payable in gold, for the express purpose of keeping them at or near par with coin. The legal-tender act was regarded as a temporary war measure, extraordinary in its nature, but necessary at the time, to enable the Government to provide the means for the vigorous prosecution of the war in which we were then engaged. The distinguished gentleman from New York, in reporting the bill to the House January 28, 1862, said:

The bill before us is a war measure; a measure of necessity, and not from choice. Thus we see this legislation was never intended to be permanent in its character or become the settled policy of the Government, but adopted only until the exigencies requiring it should have passed, when it was expected we would return to our original financial basis.

when it was expected we would return to our original financial basis. By the act of March 3, 1863, a further issue of $150,000,000 was authorized, and the right to fund them into 6 per cent. bonds was limited to July 1, 1863. This, to my mind, was the great and fearful mistake of the financial legislation of that day. It took away from the legal-tenders the only support they ever had, and gave to the people an irredeemable paper currency, which from that day depreciated in value with great rapidity, until in July, 1864, these promises to pay were worth in coin but forty cents to the dollar. The currency at once became inflated to an alarming extent by the issue of different kinds of Government notes. All kinds of commodities rapidly advanced in price as the currency became depreciated. The people plunged headlong into all sorts of extravagance, and general demoralization of all legitimate business was the consequence.

The legal-tenders, thus left without any support from the Government, struggled along with varying fortune until the people became alarmed, and demanded that something should be done to save the currency from further depreciation, when Congress by the act of March 12, 1866, again authorized the funding of these notes into gold bonds. At once they began to appreciate in value; and continued so to do until Congress, by unwise legislation, again prohibited the further funding of these notes. Had the policy early inaugurated by the Government making the legal-tenders convertible into gold bonds never been departed from, I feelfully justified in saying, we could easily have returned to specie payment many years ago, and without any serious disturbance in the business affairs of life. This sad and almost fatal mistake of the past ought to teach us wisdom in future legislation upon the same subject.

By the act of March 18, 1869, the Congress of the United States "solemnly pledged its faith to make provision at the earliest practical period for the redemption of United States notes in coin," which pledge, unfulfilled, stands upon the statute-books as the law of the land to this hour. And yet, notwithstanding this pledge and the early history of legislation relating to the issue of these legal-tenders, almost unbroken as it is, pledging early redemption and withdrawal, we find here on this floor in the year 1876, eleven years after the close of the war which made these issues necessary, gentlemen claiming to be statesmen demanding not only that these notes shall not be redeemed and canceled, but vigorously clamoring for an unlimited issue of these irredeemable promises, bounded only by the demands of that undefined and undefinable phrase, "the business wants of the country." To my mind no more dangerous policy to the well-being of the country could be contemplated.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment this country can never prosper under the effects and operation of an irredeemable paper currency, fluctuating in value as it necessarily must, thereby destroying all the business calculations of the people. Capital is timid and will not be employed where there is so much uncertainty and doubt as to ultimate profits, growing out of the fact that the circulating medium has no fixed and certain value. This uncertainty works great evil and damage to all classes of citizens, but to none so great as the laboring men of the country. Nothing is safe, nothing is secure; and prudent men will not embark in active business because of this very uncertainty, and therefore capital is withdrawn rather than take the chances of a further depreciation of the currency and the consequent decline of everything in which investments might be made. There are millions of capital lying idle all over this country, and tens of millions more invested in United States stocks and other securities, which, upon a return to a safe, solid, and permanent financial basis, would immediately spring into activity, sending a new impulse into all the business interests of the country, and give employment to hundreds of thousands now suffering for the very necessaries of life. The man of wealth and free from debt may grow richer out of the

The man of wealth and free from debt may grow richer out of the necessities of others, no matter how wide the margin between the gold dollar and the paper promise; but the poor laboring-man, who buys nearly everything at the gold standard and receives his salary and wages in depreciated paper currency, is the greatest sufferer, and has the largest interest in an early return to the specie standard.

But, Mr. Chairman, a statement is often made on this floor by those who demand an increase of the circulation that the present depression is caused by the contraction of the currency, and that we cannot hope for a revival of trade and commerce until our whole financial policy is changed. We are also told that the panic of 1873 was caused by this same unwise contraction, and that if the same system of withdrawal is to continue, the country will be ruined and the people made bankrupts.

Now, sir, from this conclusion I entirely dissent. Let us examine the facts in the case. The panic came upon us in the autumn of 1873 unheralded and unexpected by most of the people, and at a time when there had been no sudden change in our financial policy, as Congress had not been in session for months, and no new policy had been the Scorphy of the Treasure.

on the 30th day of June, 1864, Congress passed an act solemnly declaring that United States notes, issued and to be issued, should never exceed $400,000,000. Under the operation of the act of March 12, 1866, which again authorized the funding of United States notes, about $44,000,000 of legal-tenders, were retired, but not canceled, and the currency for the time being contracted to that amount, when Congress by the act of January 1, 1868, prohibited the further reduction of these notes. From that day to this there has been no contraction of the legal-tender currency. Now, the panic of 1873 could not have been caused by the contraction of the currency, for the reason no contraction had taken place for years before that date.

I do not propose to rest this statement upon my own assertion, but will prove it by authority that cannot be successfully assailed or contradicted. By reference to the last annual report of the Treasurer of the United States, made to the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 486, we find a comparative statement of United States currency outstanding at the close of the fiscal years 1862 to 1875 inclusive, which I here append as a part of my remarks, fully corroborating what I have said on this subject, and to which statement I invite the careful attention of those who differ with me upon this question.

But let us look at this matter a little more in detail and compare the year 1872, one year before the revulsion, with 1874, one year after the panic. The report shows that at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, there was outstanding of United States currency the sum of $399,245,363.52, while on the 30th day of June, 1874, there was outstanding the sum of $428,547,693.84; showing, during these two years and covering the panic of 1873, not a contraction, as is claimed, but an actual increase of $29,302,330.32. It may also be observed that for a period of years before the panic the country was reasonably prosperous. Business was active and all branches of trade and commerce seemed remunerative and permanent, when suddenly the crash came and thousands of imaginary fortunes were swept away in an hour. Upon examination it was found that the people had become reckless and extravagant in their expenditures; that an irredeemable paper currency had become cheap and abundant, causing fictitious values in all the commodities and necessaries of life; that vast sums of money had been invested in enterprises yielding no income, most of it borrowed on long time upon doubtful security, and when no more could be obtained the revulsion became inevitable, and deep and widespread disaster followed, and was the price paid for this great departure from the legitimate and safe rules of trade and commerce.

Early in the war it became apparent that other means than such as then existed must be provided to meet the growing demands upon the Treasury in sustaining, arming, and equipping a large army, and paying other expenses incident to the struggle for national existence.

After much discussion by the leading minds of that day, it was proposed to gradually issue national-bank notes secured by United States bonds deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency, which notes were expected to take the place of bank-notes previously issued un-der the laws of the several States. The first national-banking law was approved February 25, 1863, and under it national banks were established in different sections of the country. The basis upon which under this act banking was to be done, was the bonded debt of the United States secured by the faith and credit of the nation. In other words, the Government wanted money to carry on the war, and to obtain this it put its bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest payable in coin upon the market and offered them to the people at their face value. The patriotic, Union-loving citizens at once came forward and largely invested their means in these bonds; not only the rich, but the men of small means as well; and the Government was thereby enabled to procure such aid, drawn directly from the people them-selves in the shape of a loan, as was required to meet the great press-ing necessities of the hour.

Under this act, associations of five persons were authorized to organize national banks by depositing United States 6 per cent. bonds, previously purchased of the Government, with the Comptroller of the Currency, who was then directed to issue to such banking associated to the comptroller of the currency. ation 90 per cent. of their deposits in national-bank notes for circula-These notes were redeemable in United States legal-tenders, and at once became at par with them. By this method of banking the Government found great relief and was no longer at the mercy of foreign nations, because the necessary means to successfully carry on the war were furnished by the people themselves and we were not on the war were furnished by the people themselves and we were not obliged solely to depend upon the sale of our bonds in the countries of the Old World. We have also by this system secured a permanent, uniform currency, based upon the credit of the nation, and without restriction as to the amount to be put into circulation; for, by the act of January 14, 1875, banking has been made absolutely free, bounded only by the ability to deposit United States bonds with the Comptroller as security for the redemption of every dollar issued. The charge, therefore, that the national-banking law is a monopoly has no force, as it is free and open to all.

But it is sometimes urged that these associations derive an undue

But it is sometimes urged that these associations derive an undue benefit from their circulation, since at the same time they receive interest on their bonds deposited with the Comptroller.

Mr. Chairman, did it ever occur to the mind of objectors that these bonds, purchased with the money of the people, are not held by the Comptroller for the benefit of these associations, but for the sole and only benefit of the bill-holders, to secure them against possible loss. These bonds were issued in times of great national distress and embarrassment, and are a debt against the Government, to the payment of which the faith of the nation is pledged; and it matters not whether they are held by the banks or by the people themselves, the interest must be paid the same, for whoever has loaned money to the Government is entitled to the interest thereon.

While it is not my purpose in any way to defend the national-banking act, and admitting that the law in every respect may not be perfect, yet I think it infinitely superior to any system ever adopted by the American people, and ought not to be abandoned until some other and better is proposed.

Mr. Chairman, having thus briefly glanced at the legislation authorizing the issue of legal-tender United States notes and of national-bank notes, and discussed as I have been able the merits of each, I now propose to consider the propositions submitted by our inflation friends on the other side as the antidotes to cure all our financial difficulties. They may be stated: first, immediately repeal the resumption law; second, repeal the national-banking act; and, third, issue United States legal-tenders to take the place of national-bank notes. These notes are to be mere "promises to pay," not redeemable in coin, and there is to be no limit to the amount to be issued, except as found in the "wants of trade," whatever that may mean. This would place the currency wholly in the hands of a partisan Congress, where it is liable to be increased or decreased, as the supposed interest of the party in power may require. No permanent, well-defined financial policy can be adopted and maintained, because in this country parties are not permanent, and to leave a question of this magnitude to be manipulated by party organizations would utterly demoralize all the business interests of the country. To my mind, no more dangerous proposition could be submitted to the American Congress, or one fraught with more evil to the nation's welfare, were its adoption possible. It is inflation of the most dangerous kind, and can never have my approval. It needs no argument to show that the more paper currency is issued, with no means of redemption, no balance-wheel to regulate its value, the more it becomes depreciated, producing derangement in every department of business. The history of all the past proves the truth of this statement. The credit of the nation, even, avails nothing when its promises are openly repudiated and no provision made to

What, then, is to be done? First of all, take no steps backward, but provide by additional legislation what may be deemed necessary to secure, at the earliest day possible, resumption of specie payments. It is perfectly idle to suppose the national banks can resume while the United States neglects or refuses to made good its promise to redeem or pay its notes in coin or its equivalent. This it can never do as long as the volume outstanding remains at or near $376,000,000, as at present. Sir, in my judgment, the first positive thing to be done is to restore the legal-tenders to their original standing by making them convertible into gold bonds bearing a low rate of interest, limthem convertable into gold bonds bearing a low rate of interest, limiting the amount to be funded in a single month, so that the business interests of the country may be as little disturbed as possible. Provide by law that $3,000,000 per month may be funded into bonds running forty years, bearing interest at 4 or 4½ per cent. per annum, principal and interest payable in gold, until the volume outstanding shall not exceed $150,000,000, when the whole balance may be funded at the option of the holder, and that no portion of the notes so funded shall ever be re-issued.

This slow but certain process would so appreciate the greenbacks that long before the volume outstanding should be reduced to the amount named, they would be at par with coin, and it would be accomplished without any violent contraction; for the reason that banking has been made free, and national-bank notes would be issued and take the place of legal-tenders withdrawn, if the business of the country demanded more currency and it could find profitable investment. There could be no forced or unnatural contraction for the reason stated, while on the other hand no dangerous expansion could take place; for, as the United States had made good its promise to pay the legal-tenders in coin, the national banks would also redeem their notes in coin or its equivalent, legal-tenders. With specie payments or resumption there can be no danger of inflation or a redundant currency; for, the moment more is issued than can find profitable investment, they will be returned to the banks for redemption.

I am not in favor of radical measures looking to violent contracion, because that would bring great hardship and distress upon a large number of our citizens known as the debtor class. Neither do I favor any policy or kind of inflation, because it is unjust to the creditor class, and benefits only the adventurer and the man who desires to do business upon capital not earned. Irredeemable paper currency, having no certain and fixed value, becomes the agent to disturb all the channels of trade and unsettle all the calculations of life, thereby greatly retarding the happiness and prosperity of the people. I am in favor of an early return to specie payment, and am ready to favor any legislation looking to that end. The cry of inflationists, that resumption is not possible, does not move me, for I believe it is possible, nay, certain, if we have the courage to be honest and place the Government in a condition to redeem its broken promises and pay i.s indebtedness according to the express terms of the

I firmly believe this country can never be prosperous until we settle down to a sure, safe, and permanent financial basis. Business will then resume its wonted channels. Capital now lying idle will seek Confidence will be restored to the manufacturing interests of the country, the mechanic and laboring man will find ready and profitable employment, and every branch of industry will feel the invigorating stimulus caused by the sound and healthy condition of our financial affairs. Our credit abroad will be greatly strengthened, and, instead of being embarrassed, we shall become the strongest and most self-reliant nation on the face of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, the country needs, nay, demands rest. The people have become tired of constant irritation over this question, while capital has become so timid that it easily retires into the great monetary centers and refuses investment. Confidence is lost, and cannot be restored while this unsettled state of things exists. We need to move stored while this unsettled state of things exists. We need to move back slowly but certainly to firm and solid ground, and eliminate from our financial system all unnatural elements which have crept in and were thought to be necessary while we were in the struggle for national existence. But eleven years after the close of the war, and in a time of profound peace, with wealth and resources unbounded and a population full of vigor and enterprise, we should at once re-trace our steps and fall back to our normal condition. The national faith, the honor of the Government is solemnly pledged to early resumption; the good of the country requires it; the toiling millions demand it. Shall we, their representatives, neglect or refuse the legislation necessary to accomplish it? It will require wisdom and courage to do the right, but an approving people will be the reward.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. Vance, of North Carolina, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 486) fixing the times and places for holding certain terms of the district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the real character of the great political parties of this country has been aptly illustrated by their respective modes of treating the bills introduced under the auspices of the Committee on Appropriations. Want well-nigh universal, paralyzed energy, depression in business without precedent—and that too in the presence of resources unequaled—have been the potent arguments to which that committee—all honor to them—have given respectful heed. Retrenchment is the watch-word of the patriot, not the shibboleth of the partisan; yet the moment the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] announced his purpose to reduce the annual expenditures of the Government $30,000,000 the forces of the Administration organized in a solid column and by dint of the rarest discipline marched under fire, suffering not the slightest defection, losing not a single man by desertion. Sarcasm has been their chief resort. Comparisons have been instituted between European and American modes of conducting foreign relations unfavorable to this country. They affect to despise the narrow, contracted, and selfish policy of the United States. As for France, England, and Prussia, they eulogize them as generous, high-toned, magnificent. They express themselves disgusted with the rigid simplicity of a republic. They confess that they are enchanted with the grandeur and dignity of empire and monarchy.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are simple enough to regard the superior cheapness of a government and the modest demeanor of its officials as unanswerable arguments in favor of the democratic system. They are opposed to all unnecessary ostentation and display. Hence that grand popular uprising a year ago which impressed itself, even upon this obtuse and corrupt Administration. The people then resolved that this Government was an agency created to supply a need of the people, not a luxurious device for the benefit and enrichment of an office-holding class. But the leaders of to-day's republicanism have forgotten the voice of yesterday. They have opposed retrenchment at every step; they have attempted to defeat every economic endeavor; they have indulged in silly assumptions of superiority in wisdom and statesmanship, attributing ignorance to those who believed with the people that economy and efficiency are not incompatible elements in the administration of the national Gov-

POSITION OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY ON FINANCE IN THE PAST.

They have sought refuge in other fields of controversy, and while assailing democracy, have attempted to justify the republican party in its policy regarding finance, currency, and specie resumption. This attempted justification it is my purpose to defeat. The falsity of so-called republicanism to just notions of finance and taxation, economy, and integrity in the administration of affairs, it is my determination to expose.

While it is quite true superficially that such questions are not germane to the pending bill, a real economy can be secured only by the adoption of a correct system of finance and taxation. No real, genuine reform can be had without radical change herein. All the marvelously criminal extravagance of our national administration since the prostration of the rebellion grows out of the oppressive, iniquitous, and inquisitorial methods of taxation which have obtained, and the shifting, ever-changing policy of finance, which has disregarded all moral obligations, destroyed the element of confidence in all business transactions, and by a reversal of policy from contraction to inflation at a time when the country was drifting toward recuperation and prosperity plunged the Republic into a black midnight of bankruptcy and desolation, brought all enterprise to a dead halt, and staggered every feeling heart with that fearful chorus swollen by the accents of tens of thousands crying vainly for shelter and bread.

A terrible winter in 1873, a terrible winter in 1874, a terrible win-

A terrible winter in 1873, a terrible winter in 1874, a terrible winter in 1875! And yet the party on whom has devolved the responsibility of national administration for the last fifteen years, which has bequeathed to this country all this heritage of want and woe, which has been rebuked at the polls, is to-day asking the country to commend it for rigid honesty and strict fidelity to just notions of finance and economy.

It has commissioned the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. the interest upon its Blaine] as its fittest, most eloquent champion, to present to the American people its aptitude for government. Never before in one | Maine, [Mr. Blaine.]

brief hour was there so much pretension crowded as in that effort of his to vindicate the republican party. Never before were the facts of history so thoroughly assailed. His utter disregard of actual historical data is equaled only by that disregard of constitutional limitations confessed by my juvenile Trojan friend [Mr. Townsend] in the centennial discussion, when in the contemplation of his own immense rotundity he alluded to me as his "emaciated friend."

tions confessed by my juvenile Trojan friend [Mr. TOWNSEND] in the centennial discussion, when in the contemplation of his own immense rotundity he alluded to me as his "emaciated friend."

Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to discuss the present condition of the country. We are oppressed by paralysis; the panic is gone, but there has been no relief, no revival; enterprise yet stands still; capital, though abundant, is idle; labor is in no demand; money and all other commodities have lost their circulatory power; only necessary exchanges take place; and the country expects a release from these distressful, harassing conditions from us. Are we equal to the fulfillment of this expectation? What is the remedy? The gentleman from Maine has suggested none. What, sir, would you do, if the power were in your hands? That is the question he should have answered to the satisfaction of his anxious countrymen. Then, indeed, would there have been a joyful acclamation at the rising of the star in the East; then, indeed, would he have been hailed as high priest and prophet; then, indeed, would the people have forgiven even his unwillingness to bestow upon them, sighing for reconciliation and peace, that boon of heavenly sanction, universal amnesty.

REPUBLICAN RECORD ON FINANCIAL QUESTION.

But the republican party, Mr. Chairman, have a record; and here it is:

First, they authorized the issue of Treasury notes and enacted they should be legal-tenders in all transactions, public and private, without any constitutional warrant or authority.

Second, they supplemented that unconstitutional act by an error equally as gross, in making the interest on the bonds payable in gold instead of currency.

Third, they violated the plighted faith of the nation by the repeal of the act which solemnly provided for the conversion of what was called legal-tenders into 5.20 bonds, thereby outraging every principle of justice, violating all law, and doing that which was no less injurious to the moral sense than to the material interests of the country.

Fourth, when the receipts of the Government vastly exceeded its expenditures, instead of hoarding the gold in the coffers of the Treasury and preparing a fund for ultimate redemption, instead of liquidating the indebtedness of the Government, which was dishonored, and paying off the debt which was overdue, they appropriated the surplus means to the payment of debt which was removed twenty years from maturity.

Fifth, after pledging themselves to the policy of contraction, after approving the measures resorted to by Secretary McCulloch, after solemnly pledging themselves by a vote of this body, there being a minority of only six, to approve and sustain that policy, they committed the great crime of the century by lending themselves to speculators and adventurers, the henchmen of this Administration; to the men to whom subsidies had been given, in money and land, to aid them in floating these iniquitous enterprises. And the collapse quickly followed.

Sixth. It has assailed the doctrine of stare decisis, which under monarchical systems is even beyond the reach of the Crown. It has inflated the Supreme Court in order to legalize inflation, and, in defiance of all precedent, reversed a solemn decree of that court; subordinating one branch of the Government by a combination of the other branches. Seventh. Not content to abide by that decision, which was the re-

Seventh. Not content to ablde by that decision, which was the result of its peculiar policy, and which set at least a limit on this act of state folly and state crime by declaring that legal-tenders could only be issued under the pressure of necessity in a period of war, they actually issued yet more and inflated the currency yet further without even the pretense of legal authorization.

All this accumulation of crimes and blunders are the only vouchers which the Administration presents to the American people. It says: "Behold, here is our past; from that judge what we will do in the future. Are we not champions of the nation's honor?"

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] should be congratulated when he stands upon the floor of this House, he who has been the friend and counselor of this republican party, who attempted and succeeded in securing the indorsement of all its measures before the American people in 1872, and exclaims, with a countenance serious in its aspect: "Fellow-citizens, behold what the republican party has done in the direction of honesty and economy; they are the only guardians of national credit. It has been faithful in the past; trust it in the future." Indulging in those unjustifiable and unwarrantable assertions as to the position of the republican party, he saw fit to denounce that honest element of the democracy, which is supreme in the State of New York to-day, as pharisaical. What, then, should be said of the republican party with its fame all blotted over with infidelity and incapacity as criminal as crime itself? Hypocrisy is a mild designation for pretenses so startling and so unfounded. If the State of New York, in a period of war under a democratic government, disdained to avail itself of a law on the statute-books of the United States by the vote of the republican party and insisted upon paying the interest upon its bonds in gold, is pharisaical, then Phariseeism is an attribute that would well adorn the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blane.]

TARIFF A CAUSE OF FINANCIAL DISTRESS

The republican party have contributed to the distresses now prevailing in this country, not only by their peculiar measures of finance, but also by the tariff system now upon the statute-book, a system which is unequal, oppressive, and inquisitorial in its character, which by its unwarrantable discriminations and exactions has induced overproduction; has discouraged and almost wholly checked immigraproduction; has discouraged and almost whonly enecked immigra-tion; has destroyed utterly the exports of the country, compelling us to send abroad instead thereof large quantities of gold, the enforced scarcity of which has rendered resumption utterly impossible. Now it is a part of any just financial measure to remodel and simplify the existing tariff.

The injury the country has sustained by this tax system, which boasts the republican party as its fostering parent, which is designed to nurse special industries rather than yield revenue, is beyond all computation, morally and materially.

TREATMENT OF THE SOUTH HAS PREVENTED RESUMPTION.

There is yet another cause, Mr. Chairman, deeper than this, which has interfered with the prosperity of the country, and retarded an adjustment of its financial difficulties; and that is the treatment of the republican party toward the South. More than ten years have elapsed since the last rebel pleaded as a suppliant for mercy at the shrine of an insulted nationality. Throughout the South the people have yearned for genuine reconciliation and peace, to the end that we might be once more brethren; that its dilapidated houses might be repaired; that its fields might once more blossom with plenteous harvests; that hates might be buried beneath the same sod which covered the graves of its heroes. They begged that we would accept them as peers, promising love for the flag and obedience to the Constitution, including the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth constitutional amendments, fortifying the results of the war. But how was that appeal and plea responded to? Generous hearts, Charitable hearts, Christian hearts—the Sumners, the Chases, and the Greeleys, responded, "So mote it be;" but not so with so-called republicans. They struck at the white banner of mercy and peace; they uplifted the black banner of discord and hate; they forced upon the people of the South rulers not of their choice; they stamped out the life of State sovereignties; they inaugurated and sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the south rulers are the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the south rulers are the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the south rulers are the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the sustained a reign of plundars and the surface of the surfa There is yet another cause, Mr. Chairman, deeper than this, which of the South rulers not of their choice; they stamped out the life of State sovereignties; they inaugurated and sustained a reign of plunder which has driven the people almost to the verge of beggary. All this has been done with the sanction of the Administration, and enforced at the point of the bayonet. The result of this, materially, I say nothing of its moral effect, has been to destroy the productive energies of the people, and all the millions, tens of millions of commodities that would otherwise have been exported to European countries wherewith to settle our balance of trade are now charged up acquired up, and gold has to be exported to make up the difference. against us; and gold has to be exported to make up the difference. Here, then, is another cause directly interfering with, and indefinitely deferring the resumption of specie payments.

PROSTRATION OF SHIPPING INTEREST PREVENTS FINANCIAL ADJUSTMENT.

Then, Mr. Chairman, the republican party by their senseless tariff have also interfered with the ship-building interest. They have prevented people from engaging in that industry; they have prevented our people from purchasing ships built elsewhere. All the traveling trade is calmly surrendered to Great Britain. Millions and tens of millions paid for this business are all expended in foreign countries to the detriport of our people sensely sensitive this detriport. of millions paid for this business are all expended in foreign countries, to the detriment of our people, causing a still further drain of gold from the country. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will certainly be agreed that a rehabilitation of our commerce and the pacification of the South are objective points well worthy of a patriot's ambition. Shall we turn to the republican party for relief? Is there anything in their history that discloses their special aptitude for this task? There is the iniquitous tariff law upon the statute-books. There, too, is the memory of the sermon preached by the reverend gentleman from Maine upon the resurrection, recalling from the grave long-luvied bates. Alas! expect not too much from a party which promburied hates. Alas! expect not too much from a party which promises only to disappoint.

Mr. Chairman, let us now consider some of the measures of finance proposed and heed some of the pretentions wherewith we are plied. Let us first discuss what is known by the commanding designation of the "American system of finance," the interconvertible 3.65 bond scheme

Mr. HOLMAN said: If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] will yield, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from New York will be allowed to finish his speech now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps if any other gentleman desires to speak this evening, the gentleman from New York will avail himself of some other time to finish his remarks.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We have staid here until seven o'clock lately, whenever the "raw beef" was brought in. I hope we shall not adjourn so early this evening.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] insist on his motion?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not, if any gentleman now present wishes to be heard this evening. [After a pause:] As no gentleman appears desirous to go on now, I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H.R.No.2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

[Mr. Cox here took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BASS. I rise to a question of privilege. During the past few days, owing to my condition of health, I have not been able to attend regularly upon the sessions of the House, nor to attend upon the duties of the committee of which I am a member, although I am advised that committee has been diligently at work in the discharge of its duties. But during these few days I find, on examination of the record, that a subject has been under discussion affecting the conduct of the various members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and in the course of which, as appears, certain charges were made tending at least to reflect upon two gentlemen who are the republican minority of that committee. Unless this had been done, sir, I should have taken no occasion to rise upon this floor, detaining this House from its regular business, to make any statement in regard to myself. I have never taken any time of the House while I have been a member of it on any subject of that character, personal or otherwise.

I find published in the Congressional Record of March 8 the reported speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, in which the following language occurs:

I will not undertake to say who it was that prosecuted this investigation from its inception to its conclusion. I will not say that no member of a certain political organization from the day that Congress convened until this proof was all in, signed and sealed, ever crossed the threshold of that committee-room. I will not say that. But if it is true let the gentlemen answer whom it strikes. But I will say this; that upon the floor of the House the other day—and the Record bears me out in this—I did those gentlemen of the other side of the House upon that committee more than justice by my silence. I then said they had agreed upon this report as promptly as the democratic members. I did not say more. Whether it was because I could not truthfully I leave the country to infer.

At a later period in the same debate the gentleman is reported to have used the following words:

have used the following words:

I feel authorized to say that from the day when Congress convened until last Wednesday, when the proof was all in and signed and sealed, no one republican member of that committee ever crossed the threshold of the committee-room, although, as the gentleman from Ohio admits, he was notified more than once to attend. It was then, when a culmination had been reached of the inquiry, that a special messenger was sent to ask these two republican gentlemen to come to the committee-room and read the proof before we made a report to the House; and I now reiterate what I said upon this floor last Thursday, that from that time no democratic member of that committee was more earnest, more vigilant, or more honest in his endeavors to bring this guilty party to justice than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Danford] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass.] That is the whole truth.

As the two statements are directly in conflict as to a very material fact, I leave the gentleman to reconcile the same to this House and to his own conscience. If he stated the whole truth in the last allegation, how is it that he has saved the reputation of the republican members of that committee by withholding the truth in the previous speech delivered in this House? But to give any pertinence or force whatever to the charge against the members who were not present on the first day of the Belknap investigation, it became necessary to show that that investigation was commenced on a regular committee day; and I find the impression has been conveyed to this House to that effect, as it was to those members, for the House will recollect that my colleague upon the committee the gentlemen from Ohio expressly stated in some remarks the other day that he understood the investigations were being conducted at regular meetings. The first statement of the proceedings of the committee as reported to this House and set forth in the copy of the journal of the committee is as fol-

TUESDAY MORNING, February 29, 1876.

The committee met. Present: Messrs. Clymer, Blackburn, and Robbins. Mr. Marsh, a witness, being present, was duly sworn by the chairman, and was examined by the committee. (See evidence.)

Messrs. Blackburn, Clymer, and Robbins submitted statements regarding an interview had by Mr. Blackburn with the wife of the Secretary of War, which were marked C. D. E. respectively, and ordered to be made part of the evidence. Adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Tuesday was the regular committee-day, and as the first statement that appears in the Journal in regard to this investigation is of the date of Tuesday morning, February 29, the members of this House were justified in inferring that they were the first proceedings by the committee with reference to the investigation through witnesses of the charges against the Secretary of War.

But, sir, what are the facts? I call the attention of the House to a statement made by the witness Marsh, which is contained in the report of the committee. The testimony of that witness in chief, it will be observed upon an examination of the report, was taken and subscribed by him, and dated Tuesday, February 29. But upon page 6 of the report it will be seen the witnesses testified as follows on that day:

Shortly before two o'clock p. m. yesterday I came to the Capitol to meet the commit-tee, and Dr. Tomlinson found me in the corridor near the committee-room door. He said: "You are going before the committee, and I want you to remember that there was no arrangement with you and the Secretary of War at the time of the funeral, and that the money you have always paid to General Belknap was for Mrs. Belknap, and by her directions." I told him I was going before the committee to tell the whole story, as far as I could recollect it. I said I had thought of leaving the country, but was overruled; and that now I shall tell the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He said: "I don't want you to tall any lies; I only want you to tell the truth, and that is the truth." I said the truth I shall certainly tell, and if it does not hurt General Belknap, no one will be more rejoiced than myself. I entered the committee-room at about two o'clock yesterday, and without being sworn I made a statement to certain members of the committee of the facts in the case—more briefly, but substantially as I have now answered in reply to your chief interrogatory.

It therefore appears from the record of the committee and the testimony of the witness Marsh, upon the faith of which an important resolution of impeachment has been passed by this House, that the first session of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department when the witness Marsh was present was held on Monday, the 28th day of February, at two o'clock in the afternoon. I beg to ask the gentlemen upon the other side why the republican minority of the committee were not advised of that meeting? The House will recollect that at that time permission bad not been granted to the committee to sit during the sessions of the House, such authority having been given them a few days later.

Who were the members of the committee, purporting to be "the committee," who met and interviewed the witness Marsh so secretly on this Monday afternoon? Why were not the republican members, who were sitting face to face with gentlemen on the other side, advised, at least, of that meeting, which was not upon a regular committee-day, as to which there had been no previous notice, and which must be conceded to have been a special and extraordinary meeting? I was present in my seat in the House that day, and I am assured that my republican colleague was in attendance upon his duties in this House at the same time.

It would appear further from the examination of the testimony of the 'witness Marsh that this first meeting was a pre-arranged and concerted meeting. It appears that he arrived in this city at 6.30 of that morning; that at eight o'clock Dr. Tomlinson called at the door of his room; that thereupon he, the witness Marsh, wrote a note and a letter to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and that in pursuance of some arrangement he expected to meet the committee at their room at two o'clock. Dr. Tomlinson evidently knew of the same arrangement, as he was present and met the witness "near the committee-room door." The following is the testimony of the witness upon these points:

I reached Washington yesterday morning at 6.30 and stopped at the Arlington, my wife being with me. Was shown to a temporary room at about seven o'clock. I laid down, being greatly fatigued, and at about eight o'clock Dr. Tomlinson called me to the door of the room. He said he had seen Blackburn, and that he still thought this matter could be fixed up without any trouble. He asked me if I had the letter I had written to the committee on Thursday night. I said, "I had not." He said, "Blackburn says you had better write another of the same purport and send it up to the committee, with a note explaining why it did not come sooner." I did so. [The note and letter are marked B and C.]

It would be interesting to know in this connection whether Dr. Tomlinson, the brother of Mrs. Belknap, whose mission it seemed to be to get this matter "fixed up without trouble," was the messenger between the witness and the members of the committee present at that meeting.

The first notice I ever had of any official proceedings before the committee was on the morning of Wednesday, the 1st of March. On Tuesday I was in my seat in the House, near the gentlemen of the committee, who for two days it would seem had been pursuing this investigation, but no lisp or advice of the proceedings in this matter reached me from them or either of them.

Why such concealment, when the members of the committee were sitting in each other's presence day after day in this House? After such proceedings as these it is that the House of Representatives is dramatically told, not once only, but several times, that certain members did not cross the threshold of the committee-room until the proof was all in and signed and sealed. If they had not, then was there greater reason why they should have been notified in this special and important case?

But, sir, the records of the committee show that it never held but two meetings prior to the time when it sent a telegraphic message to the witness Marsh to come before the committee, which was February 25. One of these was on the 2d day of February, for organization—six weeks after the appointment of the committee—and the other on the 19th of the same month, the third month of the session.

The question as to the discharge of the witness Marsh, and the action taken thereon by the individual members of the committee, has been discussed in this House. It was claimed by one member of the committee the other day upon this floor that a statement contained

The question as to the discharge of the witness Marsh, and the action taken thereon by the individual members of the committee, has been discussed in this House. It was claimed by one member of the committee the other day upon this floor that a statement contained in some newspaper that the republican members of the committee urged that Mr. Marsh should be detained until the case against Mr. Belknap should be disposed of was a charge of which he had a right to complain, and he intimated that it was not true. The chairman of the committee in a discussion upon this subject is reported as using the following language:

Mr. CLYMER. And then, in the presence of Judge Blair and in the presence of the whole committee, did not the witness say: "Are you done with me?" And was not my reply, or the reply of some one, this: "We do not know that we have anything more to ask you." And did not the witness then say: "I want to go to New York?" And I remember that I asked him, "When do you propose starting!" and he said, "I would like to get off very early." I asked him if he would go that night, and suggested that if he was going he could get his mileage and pay, and I even went so far as to say that I would go with him to the Sergeant-at-Arms if he was not acquainted with him. I think he intimated that he cared nothing about that. The witness left the room in the presence of and with the consent of the entire committee.

The discussions upon this subject have occurred when I was absent from the House by reason of sickness, but I now desire to say that I most distinctly dissent from the statement of the gentleman, if that is what he means, that the witness was discharged with the consent of the entire committee. I think I can refresh the recollection of every gentleman upon that committee, and convince him, if he is not unwilling to be convinced, that one of the republican minority on the committee, in much less than half an hour before the discharge of this witness by the chairman of the committee, and at the same session, strenuously opposed his discharge, and stated some reasons therefor. The witness was discharged at half past eleven o'clock that Thursday, the 2d day of March, or within a very few minutes of that time. The objections that were made were made in the presence of the committee alone, and when that subject was under discussion considerably after eleven o'clock of that day, as I think I will be able to show most conclusively.

I now call the attention of the members of the House and of the committee to the journal of the committee, contained in the report to this House on page 2. It appears by that report that the first meeting which the republican minority attended was on Wednesday, and the committee will recollect that there was no proposition in the committee with reference to the discharge of this witness on that day, as he had not even been cross-examined.

The next meeting of the committee, as shown by the journal, was at 10.30 a.m. the following day, Thursday. As I was about leaving my house to attend the committee meeting, a gentleman called upon some business which detained me a short time, and I did not reach the committee-room until a very few minutes after eleven o'clock, and I found present the other four members of the committee and no other person. I stated that I had been detained by a gentleman, and noticed that it was after eleven o'clock. The chairman of the committee then exhibited to me the acceptance of the resignation of the Secretary of War, with a statement of the fact that he had resigned. By referring to the journal of that day's proceedings the House will perceive that that resignation was handed in to the committee at eleven o'clock, which was before my arrival.

The question was then raised by one of the gentlemen of the committee on the other side of the House to the effect that the resignation of the Secretary had taken from the committee its jurisdiction in the premises, and he stated, in substance, that, as the committee had thus been shorn of its jurisdiction, it could not further pursue the proceedings, and that it should discharge the witness Marsh and report to the House. Discussion thereupon ensued. I replied to the arguments of the gentlemen, and urged that the resignation of the Secretary of War had nothing whatever to do with our jurisdiction or with our duty in the premises; that we were a legislative committee, and that it was within our power and our duty to pursue the investigation to the end; that, as to the discharge of the witness Marsh, I deemed it to be very unsafe and improper pending the proceedings in the case. I stated some reasons therefor; among others, that he was then the sole witness in the case, as yet uncorroborated; that, in case further testimony, either upon his own cross-examination or independently, should contradict any of his statements, it would doubtless be necessary to again call him to the witness-stand; that, in case the Secretary of War should be a witness before the committee, as we were then expecting, we could not anticipate his testimony, and it would doubtless be necessary to recall the witness Marsh; and, further, that, for the safety of the committee, regarding its reputation, I did not think it could afford to discharge the witness pending these proceedings.

The discussion upon those two questions (that of jurisdiction and the discharge of the witness) lasted for several minutes; and at that time Mr. Blair appeared at the committee-room and asked to put a single question to the witness Marsh in cross-examination. Whereupon the witness Marsh was called in, the question was propounded to him, and the answer given as stated upon page 7 of the report; which procedure could not have consumed at the outside ten minutes of time. Thereupon, without any question being asked any member of the committee, and upon the sole request of the witness, the chairman discharged him. There was then present in the committee-room the members of the committee, the witness Marsh, and Judge Blair, the counsel of General Belknap. No member of the committee indicated in any way whatever, to my knowledge, his consent to the direction of the chairman.

The witness then stated that he desired to leave for New York, as he expressed it, on the one o'clock train, and inquiry was made about his fees. The chairman of the committee offered to go with him to get his fees, and stated further that if he did not have time to get them himself before the train left, he would get them and send them by mail to him (Marsh) at New York. The witness then inquired after the contract between himself and Evans, which was in the possession of the chairman of the committee, and the chairman stated that he would send that to him by mail in a few days. The witness then left the room.

Judge Blair then inquired of the committee when they would hear the testimony of the Secretary of War; which subject the chairman stated the committee would take under consideration and advise Thereupon Judge Blair left the committee-room, and the committee had some discussion upon the subject of that request, and at twenty minutes before twelve took a recess.

The fact that the recess was taken at the time named will be recollected by the members of the committee from the circumstance that a note was handed me requesting that I would call upon the President at twelve o'clock, and the suggestion was made that I had time to comply with the request.

Mr. Speaker, these are the facts in that case. I said that the witness was discharged. He was discharged. I do not know that I can state the precise language of the discharge, but that is perfectly immaterial. Now, sir, I should not have referred to this subject, nor have mentioned what had taken place in the committee-room in this regard, except example had been set me by the various members of the committee. And was there anything so remarkable in objecting to the discharge of the witness Marsh, that it should call for criticism upon myself and my colleague with regard to our ability to attend the sessions of the committee, seeking thereby indirectly and covertly, when the gentlemen knew the reasons why I had been unable in the main to attend on that committee, to call forth censure for failure to attend upon committee duty?

Why, sir, what was the case? There was a stranger, a witness before the committee who had testified to the most grave and serious charges against a high officer of this Government, who had long been trusted. The charges were sufficient, if true, not only to justify but to require at the hands of this House his immediate impeachment. But, sir, those charges were wholly and utterly uncorroborated. Evidence was given by the witness that certain certificates of deposit had been sent to the Secretary of War. Would it not have been judicions, at least, to detain the witness long enough to send to the bank which issued those certificates to see if he had told the truth in that respect, and to find some corroborative evidence therein? And all through his testimony appeared little circumstances referred to in general which, being more fully developed, would furnish forth the evidence by which he could be corroborated if he were speaking the

But what more, sir? The charges were against a high officer of this Government. He had been before that committee and requested to make a personal defense. That had been accorded to him by the He was expected to be before that committee. Was it expected that he was to come merely to repeat the evidence given against him by Marsh, or was it rather not expected if he was sworn as a witness he would contradict in some respects at least the evidence of the witness Marsh? And every lawyer upon this floor knows how important it would then have been to have the witness Marsh present to call him in rebuttal; and if he could furnish forth other evidence to indicate as to who told the truth in any given matter in discussion or dispute, how important it would have been not only for the committee, but for the members of the House of Representatives, to be possessed thereof.

It was utterly a question of discretion with the committee. It was not their duty to keep him, except as in the exercise of their just discretion they should be convinced of the fact that his presence was required in order to make the investigation full, thorough, and com-

I am not aware, sir, that I have been guilty of any other offending than that. I did raise those objections. I think had the gentlemen listened, and not been quite so zealous instantly to report this evidence without corroboration, that perhaps the witness would have been held. But, sir, the views of the chairman of the committee in this respect are not alone held by him, as is evidenced by the speech delivered in this House by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Blackburn] a day or two since, who said in substance that he would have regarded it as an "assault" upon a witness, a "breach of faith," had he been detained after his cross-examination before the committee. I apprehend that proposition will strike every gentleman on this floor as preposter-ously absurd. An assault upon him! Is it not within the discretion of a congressional committee as to whom they will summon before it, and as to how long they will keep him in obedience to a subpœna? The committee under those circumstances had no right, important as he was to this House and country in the investigation, to discharge

After this conduct it is charged by the gentleman on the other side that other people were responsible for the escape of this witness. They ask, how could we detain him? Detain him as he was brought here, by subpœna; detain him as he was detained for several days, by subpœna. What evidence is there that the subpœna had exhausted its virtue at half-past eleven o'clock on Thursday, March 2? The witness would have remained in obedience to the subpœna, or, if not, an attachment would immediately have been issued out from this House, and an officer would have pursued him to New York on this House, and an officer would have pursued him to New York on the next train, placed him under surveillance, taken his body and returned him to the House for incarceration, if they thought that to be necessary to insure his presence and obedience to process.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, this is now made the pretext of alleging that other people were responsible for the escape of this witness. Why, sir, as appeared by a discussion in this House, the evidence was clearly brought to it that the witness left this city on the very next train that departed from it to New York at about 1:30 o'clock on that same day. And yet one of the gentlemen on the other side stated, not with qualification, but with positiveness, that, even at the time the committee reported, the witness was hanging about the portals of the Capitol; and he said afterward when questioned with regard to it, that he had every reason to believe that he was, as the last words, or among the last words, the witness used in the presence of the committee was that he proposed to leave on the one-o'clock train, if possible; what other and new fact had reached the mind of the gentleman to indicate that he was yet to remain about the portals of the Capitol?

But, sir, we find corroborative evidence to show that on Friday afternoon the witness was on his way to Montreal and north of the city of New York. There was no Cabinet meeting on Thursday; and, city of New York. There was no Cabinet meeting on Thursday; and, as was stated here the other day by the gentleman from Maine, I likewise have authority for saying that at the Cabinet meeting which was held on Friday afternoon in this city no reference whatever was made to the prosecution of the witness Marsh; and it is not believed by any member present at that Cabinet meeting that his name was even mentioned. But directions were given for the prosecution of the Secretary of War, William W. Belknap. That Cabinet meeting, too, it is well known, was not held before the witness Marsh was well on his way for Canada. So who gave him his opportunity to escape?

his way for Canada. So who gave him his opportunity to escape?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said more than I designed, but I felt I was called upon to say this much, as during my absence what I was carried upon to say this initial, as during my absence what I deemed to be at least an unfair statement of the transactions of the committee had been made. And as these facts were peculiarly within my own knowledge, and not within that of most of the members of the House, I deemed it but just to the record of this case that these facts should be fully known by this House and by the country.

Mr. CLYMER. I would, Mr. Speaker, make no reply to what has fallen from my colleague on the committee, the geutleman from New York, save, sir, that his recollection of all the events of that Thurs-AGE, save, sir, that his recollection of all the events of that Thursday morning differs so essentially, so entirely, and so radically from that of every other member of the committee that he is placed in the disadvantageous and unfortunate attitude of being the one sole witness against his four colleagues, who agree in their statement of the same facts. To prove this unmistakably and conclusively I will read the statement made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] in his remarks on this subject, made upon Tuesday last:

Mr. Danford. If it is not conceived by other members of the committee to be a secret. I feel at liberty to state just what my recollection is. On the morning of last Thursday Mr. Marsh came into the committee-room shortly after its meeting and the suggestion was made, either by himself or perhaps by the chairman of the committee, that he be discharged. That was prior to the committee baving ascertained the fact whether there would be more testimony or not before the committee. At that time I remember that Mr. Bass, my republican colleague on the committee, suggested that it would be improper to discharge the witness until the investigation was closed, and I think the chairman of the committee will remember that suggestion. Afterward the witness Marsh withdrew. It had been determined that we would take no further testimony before the committee. Mr. Marsh then came in and the question of his discharge was again before the committee, and there was no member of the committee who questioned his right to go.

Mr. BASS. That is expressly what I stated. No response whatever

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman will please not interrupt me. Mr. DANFORD proceeded:

I believe that my colleague, [Mr. Bass,] who is absent to-day on account of sickness, would bear me out exactly in the statements I make, and the only regret that I have is that Mr. Bass is not present on this occasion.

Mr. CLYMER. I know how desirous my colleague from Ohio on the committee is to do exact justice and state what is fair, and therefore I will try to refresh his memory by this suggestion: whether on the morning when Mr. Marsh appeared, and it was suggested, as I will admit, although I do not remember it personally, that he should be discharged, after that was he not cross-examined by Judge Blair, counsel for Mr. Belknap?

Mr. Darsonn. Certainly.

ounsel for Mr. Belknap?
Mr. Danford. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. And did not he then say that he had no other or further questions to ask him?
Mr. Danford. Undoubtedly.
Mr. CLYMER. And then, in the presence of Judge Blair and in the presence of the whole committee, did not the witness say: "Are you done with me?" And was not my reply, or the reply of some one, this: "We do not know that we have anything more to ask you?" And did not the witness then say: "I want to go to New York?" And I remember that I asked him, "When do you propose staring?" and he said, "I would like to get off very early." I asked him if he would go that night, and suggested that if he was going he could get his mileage and pay, and I even went so far as to say that I would go with him to the Sergeant-Arms if he was not acquainted with him. I think he intimated he cared nothing about that. The witness left the room in the presence of and with the consent of the entire committee.

A little further on in the debate the following statement was made:

Mr. Danford. I desire to state in relation to the remarks made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Clymer] that, while I do not remember the entire colloquy between himself and the witness Marsh, I do remember the substance of it. The gentleman states correctly what took place in the presence of the entire committee. The only other thing I desire to say is this: in justice to my colleague, Mr. Bass, it ought to be stated here to the House and to the country that he is at this time sick and has been upuble to attend even the sitting of the Marsh. sick, and has been unable to attend even the sittings of the House

Now, Mr. Chairman-

Mr. DANFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment just

Mr. DANFORD. Will the general years there?
Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.
Mr. DANFORD. I desire to say that I stand to-day by the statement I made on the occasion referred to, and that there is not to my mind one single discrepancy between that statement and the statement of my colleague, [Mr. BASS;] but he remembers more fully some things that took place there than what I stated.

Mr. CLYMER. Of that I leave this House and the country to judge.

Now, sir, I submit that, if the statement just made by the gentleman from New York be correct, it is impossible for the statements made on Tuesday last by the gentleman from Ohio, and then and now concurred in by all the other members of the committee, to be so. And I wish to state once for all that, had any member of that committee when the witness Marsh left that room at that time intimated in any manuer that it was his desire that he should be retained, certainly I would not have objected thereto, nor do I believe that any other member of the committee would have done so. To suggest that I am responsible for his discharge more than any other member of the committee is what is neither warranted by the facts nor just and fair in statement. I am willing to share my full responsibility of that act with every other member of the committee. And I assert most solemnly that there was, in my judgment, no power in that committee, the examination-in-chief of the witness having been finished and he having been cross-examined, having come here willingly and having answered fully and freely, and proposing to depart publicly—I say there was no power, no legitimate power, in that committee to detain him one moment longer, and that to have done so would have been to make the committee parties to an outrage and a wrong; that it would have been an arbitrary and unjustifiable procedure, for which we as a committee would have had no warrant and no legal justification; and that by so doing we would have violated one of the dearest and most sacred rights of constitutional government and of personal liberty

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I promise the House in advance that I am not going to inflict any speech upon them, for I have no doubt the House is about as sick of personal explanations, growing out of this transaction, as the country and the republican party and our friends on the other side of the House are sick of the transaction

Sir, I would not have said a word except for the queer and unusual speech that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] has made under the plea of a personal explanation.

I have no doubt that the gentleman from New York intended to state the facts; I have no doubt that the gentleman from New York intended to tell the truth. I am only sorry that his statements are not corroborated either by the committee or by what is far more irrefutable in the way of proof, the record. When a gentleman undertakes to correct a whole committee and appeals to the record, he ought to abide by that record.

As he has made deliberate statements here, carefully prepared and read from manuscript, which are flatly contradicted by the record, I leave that geutleman to settle the question of variance between himself and the record.

He says that the committee never had but two meetings, and the record of the committee shows that that is not the fact.

Mr. BASS. Will the gentleman allow me a word?
Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to be interrupted.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will proceed without interruption.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I was made the victim of misrepresentation, Mr. BLACKBURN. I was made the victim of misrepresentation, whether intentionally or otherwise, at the hands of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass,] and I bore it silently. When I read the record in response, I am not surprised that he winces. [Cries of "O, O," from the republican side of the House.] He says that the committee never had but two meetings. Here is the attested record of the committee which says differently. The committee met on February 2, and organized and named Tuesday and Friday of each week as its regular meeting days at 10.30 o'clock, of which fact both the as its regular meeting days at 10.50 clock, or which fact both the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Danford] had at least one notice. Between that day and the 19th of February the committee had three meetings, at which no business was transacted. It met again on the 19th of February, and then it did transact business. It met again on February 25, and I read from the record:

The committee met. Present: Messrs. CLYMER, BLACKBURN, and ROBEINS. A subpona by telegraph for Mr. Marsh being returned this day and he not appearing, the ch.tirman was directed to have personal service made on him, returnable on Monday next at two o'clock.

Mr. BASS rose

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to be interrupted. I want this quotation from the record to go side by side with the deliberate and care-Bass.] It is not a question of veracity between the gentleman and myself, but a question of veracity between the gentleman and myself, but a question of February 29, and here is the record.

The committee met. Present: Messrs, Clymer, Blackburn, and Robbins.

And then it goes on with the record of proceedings had.

The committee met again on Wednesday, March 1. Now, sir, so much for that. These are facts which neither of the gentlemen opposite will deny. In speaking of what occurred in the committee-room, I want the House to remember that when the report was made to the House and discussion had thereon the RECORD shows that I never once referred to any absence from the committee-room either on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] or the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Danford.] I did in that speech say that they in the matter of agreeing to the report had been as prompt as any democratic member of the committee had been. I said no more. My lips were sealed, and would have been sealed to the day of my death; I never would have been the instrument for the exposure of the fact, for fact it is and they dare not deny it, that from the day Congre-s convened until Marsh's testimony was concluded and signed neither the one nor the other of these gentlemen ever crossed the threshold of that committee-room, both of them having had notice more than once of the regular meeting days of that committee going on for weeks; and those weeks running into months they came there at last, and doubt-less they would not have been there then except that a special messenger was sent to demand that they should come and read the proof before a report was made.

Now these are facts. I did not tell them to the House before, but when the newspapers of the country came out and claimed that the republican members not only bore a share in the work of the committee but that the chairman and the democratic members of the committee are alone responsible for the absence of the witness Marsh, then I felt that I was not only warranted but that it was demanded of me that I should tell the truth and the whole truth, epecially as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Danford] had already opened up the matter.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] says that the proof shows The gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] says that the proof shows that at a certain stage of this investigation a note was written to me. That is not on the record. No man ever said it, and the record contradicts that statement flatly. No note ever was written, and nobody ever said that any note was written, and nobody ever said that any note ever was to be written, except the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass.] But that is not all.

He says that a session of this committee was held, not on the regular meeting day, on the Tuesday before the Wednesday when he was sent for to come there and read this proof. But he says a secret conclave was held on Monday evening. And again the gentleman clave was beld on Monday evening. And again the gentleman stumbles on the record, for the record says that is not true. There was no meeting held on Monday. There was to have been a meeting held then, and if that gentleman had ever been into that committeeroom he would have known that a subpœna had been sent to New York by a messenger, demanding that this man Marsh should ap-pear before the committee on Monday at two o'clock. He did come into the committee-room, as he states in his testimony, and he made a statement to every member of the committee who was in the room, and every member of the committee who had ever been in that room from the beginning of this Congress until theu. The statement was not made under oath; it was not testimony. It was a bare synopsis, as he was then giving it to us, of what his proof would be. And that proof was taken the next day, regularly and fairly, upon the regular meeting day of the committee.

These are the facts, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] has never, of course unwittingly, I am willing to state—has never yet in any instance made a statement up to this point of the review of his argument that does not flatly contradict the record and the truth.

But that is not all.

But that is not all.

He says that "the gentleman from Kentucky," alluding to myself, "intimated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] did not object to the dismissal or discharge of that witness." For the information of the gentleman I will tell him now, once for all, that he is mistaken in this. I never intimate anything; I deal in no innuendos or insinuations. I state it as broadly and flatly as my knowledge of my mother-tongue will allow me to put it, and the gentleman dare not deny it, that he never did object to or oppose the discharge of that witness except prior to the cross examination of that witness, when he stated that the witness ought to be held for cross-examination, if the defendant demanded it, to which every member of the committee assented. The witness was cross-examined. It is true that but one question was asked of him, but that was because the counsel of Mr. Belknap refused to ask him any more. It was before that cross-examination that the gentleman from New York suggested the propriety of detaining the witness. After that cross-examination was concluded, the witness asked if we had any further use for him. I do not know that I said a word. I am willing to state upon my responsibility as a man that the gentleman from New York never uttered a word. From then till now he never objected.

He says that the witness stated that he was going to leave on the half-past-one-o'clock train. I say that the witness made no such statement at all, and I appeal to the members of the committee in support of my statement. The witness did not say he was going away on the of my statement. The witness did not say he was going away on the half-past-one-o'clock train; he said he wanted to get off early, but he never named the train. The gentleman says that I have intimated or appeared to intimate that the witness Marsh was within the walls of the Capitol when the report was made.

The gentleman now says that the witness left the city at half past one o'clock. I am disposed to doubt that, though I confess I have authority equally as well calculated to induce me to believe it as the statement of the gentleman who has made so many blunders. My friend from Maine [Mr. Blaine] said that he knew that the witness Marsh left the city at half past one o'clock. I would be perfectly willing to believe that if it was not that it note my friend from learn willing to believe that if it was not that it puts my friend from lowar [Mr. Kasson] in an awkward predicament, for he said in a speech which he made here the other day that the witness got to New York the next morning. If that is true, then he never could have left this city at half past one in the afternoon, for I have heard of no accident, no railroad detention, to account for the delay. To tell the truth, I state to the House that I do not know when the witness did leave. I was not in any conference with anybody who was watching the wit-ness or who felt any further interest in him after his statement was made to the committee, had been signed by him, and reported to this House

I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] ought to know more about it than I do, because he had better opportunities for in-forming himself. He says there was no Cabinet meeting on Thursday, and that there was no threat made against Marsh in the Cabinet meeting when it was held the next day. Upon that point I yield to his superior advantages in the way of information.

But this thing I do remember, and upon that there can be no disagreement between any of us: I remember that, while the reading of this proof was going on, the committee-room was invaded by a messenger from the Executive Mansion demanding the appearance and presence at that mansion of the gentleman from New York. We had to take a recess in order to let him go to his consultation with the President, and at twelve o'clock he was there at that consultation. I yield to the gentleman's superior advantages in that regard. I was not invited to that conference. I do not know what there occurred. I do not know what occurred there; but, appreciating the gentleman as I then did, I sincerely hoped that the recently vacated War Office was about to be filled by a member of the committee that unhorsed its recent occupant. Whether he was sent for to be conwar olice was about to be filled by a member of the committee that unhorsed its recent occupant. Whether he was sent for to be converted into a Secretary of War or whether he was called there to advise with the President and his counselors in reference to the prosecution of Marsh, I do not know; I cannot know; the Executive, the gentleman from New York, and the Lord, I reckon, do only know. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the facts are stated. I have one question I want to submit, not to the gentleman from New York, but to this House. If he wanted that witness kept, if he had any desire to have Mr. Marsh detained, if he had any suspicion that Mr. Marsh would leave, why did he not, when he was in that conference with the President, suggest that the law officer of this Government should take proceedsuggest that the law officer of this Government should take proceedings to stop him from going; or, having failed in his hurry to remember that, why did he not, when the committee came to this House and made that report, ask that the House in the exercise of its power would detain the witness? He certainly was not keeping such close company with Marsh as to know before we made the report that Marsh had left. I repeat, and upon the assertion I defy contradiction, that the gentleman sat there assenting by his silence to the dis-charge of Mr. Marsh, as did each and every other member of that committee.

Whether the gentleman has acted in good taste, whether he has illustrated that appreciation for fair treatment which this House in the exercise of its judgment will require at the hands of every man here, in view of the fact that no member upon this side of the House had ever referred to the continuous, unbroken absence of the republican members of that committee until the investigation of this case had been concluded, I am willing to leave the House and the country to determine.

But I do desire to repeat, and this I put in the fewest possible words, that the gentleman from New York never did object either by word or by deed to the discharge of that witness after his cross-examination was completed, but assented to it and saw him leave the room with-was completed, but assented to it and saw him leave the room with-out a protest or a single objection.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House long upon this matter. But, in the first place, in response to some remarks made by the gentleman last upon the floor, who deals so strenuously with the record, I ask that the statement which I made with reference to the times when this committee previously held meetings may be read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman want the proceedings of the committee read?

Mr. BASS. No, sir; I was speaking to another individual. I was asking the Speaker of the House to direct the Clerk to read from the remarks which I made the record of what I had said with reference to the former meetings of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was satisfied it was not the record of the committee that the gentleman wanted.

Mr. BASS. And while the Clerk is finding the passage, I will simply say that, from some cause, I do not know what—
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the Clerk to read a statement from his own remarks

Mr. BASS. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

But, sir, the records of the committee show that it never held but two meetings prior to the time when it sent a telegraphic message to the witness Marsh to come before the committee, which was February 25. One of these was on the 2d day of February for organization, six weeks after the appointment of the committee, and the other on the 19th of the same month, the third month of the session.

Mr. BASS. Now, Mr. Speaker, the allegation made against me is that I have falsified the record; but the very record which the gentleman held in his hand and read proves precisely the truth of that statement, that the committee held a meeting on the 2d day of February and another on the 19th of February. Whether they took a recess or held another additional session that same day, I do not know; I regarded it as one meeting. Those, as I stated, were the only meetings of the committee held before the message was sent for the witness Marsh, the 25th of February.

The gentleman will therefore probably have heard sufficient of that

He risks his reputation on that and seeks to assail mine for truthfulness. He says there was no meeting of the committee held on Monday, the 28th of February. I never pretended that the record showed that there was. But what I did state in substance was—reading from the testimony of the witness Marsh-that according to his testimony there was such a meeting of the committee on that day. I did not pretend to say that there was or was not except as based upon the testimony of that witness. Now the gentleman comes upon the stand and says that the witness Marsh is a perjurer and not worthy of belief, because the committee held no meeting on that day. He, with the rest of us—and he particularly because he was one of the gentlemen who were present before this testimony was "signed and sealed"—must have heard that statement; and, if he knows now that the witness was swearing falsely, why did he not know it then and warn the House that it was not safe to rely upon his evidence?

It is conceded, sir, upon the testimony of the witness Marsh that he believed he was approaching a meeting of the committee; and it now appears by the confession of the gentleman that the witness Marsh did meet the three members of the committee who sit on the marsh did meet the three members of the committee who sit on the other side of the House; that he did make to them a statement of this case, upon the faith of which they believed that just charges existed against the Secretary of War, which would involve the question of impeachment. And yet with so grave a matter pending before them, knowing as they say of the absence of members of the committee on this side of the House, they for some unexplained cause proposed to have the meeting all to themselves and did not propose to invite us to the feast.

Now, sir, I am glad the gentleman has made at last one confession. He concedes now there was discussion about the discharge of the witness Marsh that forenoon. He said that the gentleman from New York did object to his discharge at least prior to cross-examination. Then there was discussion on that subject, was there? I am glad for so much of confession.

I recollect that discussion, for I was present then and I recollect what I said, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Danford] will bear me out in saying that it was not an objection raised with reference to his being held merely until cross-examination could be closed, but it extended to the close of the proceedings. The objection was made to the committee, it will be recollected, that they could not afford to discharge that witness; that being the precise language used.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asked why, when I was in the executive office, I did not advise the Attorney-General of the United States or the Executive with regard to the escape of this mai. Let me ask you, although the inquiry seems too absurd to answer it-let me ask you what authority in the premises the executive arm of the Government had, or the Attorney-General, until some evidence should be reported from the committee, or some resolution calling for action had been brought from that committee? The only tribunal in the world which then had jurisdiction of the witness was the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, subordinate to the authority of this House.

But, sir, the gentleman takes a queer position; both the gentlemen who spoke take very remarkable positions. They both take very extraordinary ground, and I cannot see how they can do it with any extraordinary ground, and I cannot see how they can do it with any regard for the truths of logic. Both of them have sought to maintain on this floor—the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day, and the gentleman from Kentucky the other day—most strenuously, that the committee had no right to detain this witness after his cross-examination; and why, therefore, Mr. Speaker, do they ask why did we not ask at the time he left the room he should be detained? Why, not ask at the time he left the room he should be detained? Why, Mr. Speaker, if they thought it would be an assault on him to detain him, they being of the majority controlling the action of the committee, of what use to ask them to do that which they now claim would have been illegal? I supposed they did take that view of it. They ask why did I not object. How many times must a man object and protest in your committee before his objection is to be regarded? Is not one objection urged in discussion with the members of the committee in consultation alone to be sufficient? When a witness is arbitrarily discharged without being asked the question, all being present, the counsel for the accused being present, must protest again be made in the presence of those persons most interested in securing his escape?

It is suggested, if the gentlemen did not deem they had power of detention, assuming that they regarded its necessity, it was their duty in that event to report to the House, and let it take such proceeding as should be necessary to secure the result.

ceeding as should be necessary to secure the result.

But, Mr. Speaker, there was another reason why objection was not urged again then. First, it had been urged a few minutes prior to the discharge; and, in the second place, the witness was discharged before any member of the committee had knowledge that he was to be discharged—at least on our side of the House. What value, then, before any member of the committee had knowledge that he was to be discharged—at least on our side of the House. What value, then, would it be to protest? How did I know what direction was to be given to the witness? How did my colleague know what direction was to be given to the witness? Upon his request, without consul-tation, the discharge was ordered. Would it not have been a little remarkable in me, a humble member, who had been just invited in "to hear proof read" before they should report to the House, to have interposed any protest against their action in the premises? Bear in mind, we were invited "to hear proof read," no more.

Now I do not know that I desire to say anything more. It is a

Now I do not know that I desire to say anything more. It is a very disagreeable thing to have a personal controversy involving the question of individual recollection with a gentleman anywhere, least of all in the discharge of official duty. I know, sir, and every gentleman of this House knows, that different gentlemen do not all times recollect proceedings alike; but men are more liable to forget things than they are to remember things that never transpired. And whereas the gentleman alleges that I am so effectually contradicted by the the gentleman alleges that I am so effectually contradicted by the RECORD, although that allegation has been disproved, I do not stand in fear of criticism from that source, when other statements have been made in speeches in this House which have been as remarkable as some of those to which reference has been made. One I particularly recollect, and one upon which I think I can appeal to all the other gentlemen of the committee for corroboration. Upon the prelarly recollect, and one upon which I think I can appeal to all the other gentlemen of the committee for corroboration. Upon the presentation of the articles of impeachment a denunciation was hurled by the gentleman from Kentucky against the head of the Secretary of War because it was charged he had sought to shield himself behind the dishonor of his family, whereas, as every other gentleman of that committee knows, the whole struggle had been made on his behalf with reference to avoiding their dishonor and shouldering the behalf with reference to avoiding their dishonor and shouldering the whole burden himself.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] before he takes his seat as to that last reference he made to me, that I am glad to know that I sentence has gone to record and will endure. I am glad to know that I stand before this House and before the country as one who had done all that an honorable man could do to shield from criticism and censure an innocent woman. And the gentleman from New York is welcome to stand before the country, as he does now, striving to shelter from punishment a guilty man. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before putting the motion of the gentleman the Chair will lay before the House sundry executive communications.

ORVILLE E. BABCOCK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to a House resolution of the 3d instant, copies of all instructions, orders, letters, telegrams, &c., in possession of the Department of Justice relating to the assembling or business of the military court of inquiry in the case of General Or-

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the communication be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order will be made.
Mr. HOAR. I object to any reference. There is not a quorum of the House present. This should be done to-morrow morning when the House is full. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has no right to object.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the regular order; which is the motion to adjourn is the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion to adjourn; but the Chair desires to say that it has been the usage to lay these communications before the House and have them referred Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the regular order.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the regular order.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the question on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that the regular order is to submit to the House the request which the Chair hands to the Clerk to be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The Chair has the power to decide

ALLAN C. HAMMOND.

On motion of Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Allan B. Hammond; there being no adverse report.

MRS. ANN DUCHMAN.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Mrs. Ann Duchman, widow of J. H. Duchman, late colonel of the Seventy-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; there being no adverse report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Wells, of Missouri, for ten days; to Mr. Waldron for ten days on account of important business; and to Mr. Davis for eight days.

COMMITTEE ON REFORM IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair submits also a request by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that a subcommittee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and that its chairman be authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

The motion of Mr. Morrison was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented

Also, the petition of Robert Danby, for relief, to the Committee of Claims.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SIOUX INDIAN DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Sioux Indians; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, for the purpose of supplying the Sioux Indians of different tribes, including the Santee Sioux of Nebraska, with necessary subsistence, namely, beef, bacon, flour, and corn, and for the necessary transportation thereof.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is in the nature of a deficiency for the current fiscal year. The Secretary of the Interior made an application to the Committee on Appropriations for $150,000 for the purpose of supplying this deficiency. Indeed, the amount applied for was $225,000, including $75,000 for transportation. The committee, after a very exhaustive examination, decided not to allow at present anything for transportation, and to appropri ate only $100,000, deeming that amount sufficient. That includes about twenty-three or twenty-five thousand dollars for the expenses of the conference of the Black Hills commission at Red Cloud agency. The committee desire that this bill shall be put upon its passage, and I hope there will be no objection.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. COOK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to whom were referred various petitions, memorials, and bills on the subject of the equalization of bounties, to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 58) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for Thursday of next week, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other orders, excepting business of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman should not fix so early a day as Thursday of next week. There is not, in my judgment, a possibility that the legislative appropriation bill can be finished by that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] that he ask that this bill be made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for next Thursday week, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. COOK. I am willing to agree to that suggestion, and I ask that the report accompanying the bill be printed; and I may be permitted to state that the committee are unanimous in the approval of

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order; that it requires unanimous consent to make it a special order from day to day.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the nature of an appropriation bill, and it is competent for the House, in the judgment of the Chair, to make such an order.

Mr. RANDALL. When the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union a majority of the committee can lay aside all previous bills; it is not necessary to make it a special

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a point of order; that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BANNING. That is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia,

[Mr. Cook.] Mr. HOAR. I think there is some misunderstanding. I understood the Chair to ask if there was any objection to making this bill a special order from day to day in the House until disposed of. If what the gentleman desires is to have it made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cook,] although the Chair may have inadvertently misstated it.

Mr. RANDALL. But I submit that the question of consideration will come up whether or not upon that day the House will go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the House will act then upon its own judgment.

The question was taken on Mr. COOK's motion, and it was agreed to.
Mr. COOK. I now move that the report accompanying the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of William Williams and 453 other citizens of Lawrence County, Ohio, and to request that the said petition be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and printed, and that it also be printed in the RECORD without the printing of the names. There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners desire most earnestly to represent to your honorable bodies the suffering condition of hundreds of thousands who not only risked their lives but

Your petitioners desire most earnestly to represent to your honorable bodies the suffering condition of hundreds of thousands who not only risked their lives but also gave their best efforts in all forms of property and labor to save the nation through the years of its greatest peril.

We now find ourselves deprived of our former employments, property, and means of living by what we regard as a mistake made in the fivancial policy of our country.

We believe that it is even now possible for Congress to restore prosperity to our suffering country by recognizing the fact that there should be but one kind of money for all purposes; and all that is now or ever has been required to cause Treasury notes to be and remain as valuable as gold is that the Government should make them receivable for all forms of taxes, duties, and debts, and interchangeable, at the will of the holder, with the interest-bearing bonds of the Government.

We also suggest the withdrawal of 25 per cent, annually of the present bank circulation, till all is replaced by greenbacks.

We urge on your homoable bodies, by every consideration of patriotism and humanity, and as the only means of establishing justice and promoting the general welfare, to legislate at once in the relief of the great suffering and continual loss that the present policy of the Government entails on the great mass of the people. It is a well-known fact in this and the adjoining counties that many of your petitioners have been reluctantly obliged to apply for county or township aid to save themselves and their little ones from starving.

The circumstances of the country make some relief now indispensable, as a large part of the property of the people is under mortgages that will inevitably pass the property into the hands of those who now hold mortgages for but half of its original cost.

We most urgently, therefore, press upon your consideration the means of relief set forth in this petition: and for this we will ever near.

narcost.

We most urgently, therefore, press upon your consideration the means of relief set forth in this petition; and for this we will ever pray.

COMMITTEE ON CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. DE BOLT, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That a subcommittee of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and that its chairman be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer oaths.

BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JENKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2590) transferring the Bureau of Pensions from the Interior Department to the War Department; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

PROTEST OF DISTILLERS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented a protest of the distillers of Cincinnati, Ohio, against any change in the law regulating the tax on whisky; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas by a general law of the State of California, approved May 20, 1861, it is enacted that any number of persons, not less than ten, either in this State or through any portion of the Territories of the United States contiguous to this State, being subscribers to the stock of any contemplated railroad, may be formed into a corporation for the purpose of constructing, owning, operating, and maintaining such railroad by complying with the following requirements; and whereas among the provisions in the details of the law are the following: "Sec. 2. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to suspend the further issue of any patents for land to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California under acts of Congress passed July 27, 1866, and March 3, 1871, pending this investigation.

JAMES P. GROOMS.

Mr. TURNEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2591) granting pay to James P. Grooms, a private in Company D, Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry, as an assistant surgeon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, being the legislative, &c., appropriation bill; and I desire to state that the entire day will be occupied in general discussion on that bill. I only state that fact that gentlemen may understand that there will be no morning hour to-day if my motion prevails.

The question was taken, and Mr. RANDALL's motion was agreed to. The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and indicial expenses.

ing appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

THE INTERCONVERTIBLE 3.65 BOND AND CURRENCY SCHEME.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, when I yielded to the gentleman from Indiana yesterday for a motion that the committee rise, I was about to characterize what is known as the "3.65 interconvertible bonds." I now proceed to that task. The proposition demands a new issue of greenbacks, which is incontestably unconstitutional; which is straight in the teeth of the decision already made by the courts, especially in the direction of inflation. It boldly asserts that gold and silver are not an appropriate or befitting currency. It insists that impost duties shall be paid in greenbacks, thereby dispensing with the only mode by which we can obtain gold to pay the interest on the national debt. It would endow the Government permanently and absolutely with the function of a banker. It insists beyond that, that absolutely with the function of a banker. It insists beyond that, that a bureau shall be established by the Government. An exponent of that system confidently puts forth this proposition: A bureau for the interchange of bonds and currency would be to trade as a governor to a locomotive.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] the ablest living advocate of the heresy of protection, and also of this other and viler heresy of interconvertible currency, evidently regards this proposition as a wonderful outburst of wisdom. What does such this proposition as a wonderful offburst of wisdom. What does such an establishment imply? The creation of another expensive bureau of the Government; branch agencies in every town throughout the country; high salaries for another army of office-holders; an immense body of middle-men to negotiate betwixt the Government agent and the investor, who would thrive on the money that would otherwise belong to the people; a Treasury without gold; foreign holders in vain demanding their interest; the Government protested and in disgrace; new governmental issues in violation of the Constitution; all these results would flow naturally from this wonderful. tution; all these results would flow naturally from this wonderful American system of finance. It would intensify what advocates of this system designate as existing evils. First of all contraction would result, for everybody would be anxious to exchange a dollar at a dis-result, for everybody would be anxious to exchange a dollar at a discount bearing no interest for a dollar bearing 3.65 interest—a dollar payable at no given date, for a dollar payable at a given date.

It is urged in favor of this measure that, first, it would cause the currency to be non-exportable; and secondly, that it would make interest low. Both of these arguments are unfounded and preposterous. The only reason the currency is not exportable now is because the world does not recognize its value. The moment that you convert it into something that is fixed in value—something as good as gold—it will go wherever gold does; it will be accented for what as gold—it will go wherever gold does; it will be accepted for what it is worth. When the fluctuating element disappears, then this currency will take wing. The only reason the greenback is non-exportable is because its value is uncertain—one thing to-day, another thing

ITS EFFECT ON THE RATE OF INTEREST.

More absurd still is the argument that it would make interest low Interest is dependent not upon the will of the lender, not upon the will of the borrower, not upon the will of the Government; despite all legal restrictions it will bring what it is legitimately worth. A hundred-dollar bond is worth more than a hundred-dollar bill; its purchasing power is greater. Therefore, if I lend a bond, I should charge a higher rate of interest than if I should lend a bill, and inas-charge a higher rate of interest than if I should lend a bill, and inasmuch as it was already yielding a fair interest I would be disinclined to lend it at all unless I was amply compensated. Many would not incur the risk of lending when they were certain of a fair compensation otherwise, and might thereby lose principal and interest. There would then be a scarcity of currency in circulation which would cause the rate of interest to rise mountain-high, and the great end aimed at would be further off than before.

There would not even be a remedy, for inflation is not proposed in the 3.65 scheme, and the free-banking system is to be forthwith abolished. The only resource left to our friends would be to get up a petition and procure the signatures of Henry Carey, Jay Cooke, Henry Clews, Colonel Thomas A. Scott, and present it to a republican Congress, who, believing in the omnipotence of human government, would forthwith enact a law prohibiting the exportation of American currency and fixing the rate of interest at 3.65; provided, always, that they ever regain an ascendency within these Halls.

Seriously, the 3.65 scheme is the most inexplicable measure of finance ever advocated in any civilized country. If it were exposed for awhile to the sunlight of thorough discussion its warmest friends for awhile to the sunlight of thorough discussion its warmest friends would become heartily ashamed of it.

WOULD THE 3.65 SCHEME BE A SAVING TO THE GOVERNMENT?

The sole feature which professes any special virtue is that which provides that the greenbacks over and above the amount needed for purposes of interchangeability should be used to pay off 5.20 bonds and thus save interest.

This pretense is wholly unfounded. The amount of greenbacks so invested would not exceed $300,000,000; the amount of bonds upon which interest would be saved would not exceed $250,000,000. The interest thereon and so saved would amount to only $15,000,000 per annum. The Government would pay interest on 3.65 currency bonds to the amount of $14,600,000, and there would be a net saving of interest of $400,000 per annum. But the Government would no longer collect the tax upon the circulation of the national banks, which amounted to $3,250,000 per annum last year. So, instead of gaining $400,000 per annum, we would actually lose $2,850,000 per annum. How wonderful such economy! What a fierce and brave onslaught npon the bloated bondholders! Gain $400,000! Throw into the ocean $2,850,000! But then, gentlemen, you have had your revenge upon the national-bank monopolies.

THE 3.65 SCHEME WOULD RESULT IN COMPLETE ABSORPTION OF CURRENCY.

A brief experiment of this 3.65 system would result in the complete absorption of the currency. Everybody would speed to the bureau and exchange his dollar bearing no interest for a dollar bearing interest; and the investment yielding income would be forthwith hoarded up. Such was the experience resulting from the act of 1815, as the report of Secretary Dallas completely and conclusively shows. The only explanation why such a measure as this was ever conceived and advocated is to suppose it a part of the providential plan to illustrate what fools wise men sometimes condescend to make of themselves. The condition of the country is peculiar; in periods of distress, want, and feverish apprehension, distempers are always generated; the popular pulse beats wildly. The strangest doctrines find acceptance, not only from the ignorant, but from the wise. I now address myself to the cure. No miraculous agency will come to the Instead of yielding to the clamor which it excites, we must undeceive ourselves, and it may be the people. If we ascertain precisely the difficulties of the situation, if we understand the real facts in the case, nothing unnatural will occur to us.

INFLATION-CURRENCY CANNOT BE INFLATED.

Many believe that inflation of the currency would restore prosperity. This silly belief is refuted by this proposition: there can be no infla-This strip better is refuted by this proposition: there can be no inhation of the currency. Pass a law to-morrow (waiving the constitutional question) increasing the amount of currency 25 per cent.; there would not be another real dollar in existence. A dollar issued would not be given away. He who obtained a dollar would have to pay value received for it. Such a law would simply increase the number of nominal dollars; but each dollar would be worth less than before, would have been averaged; would have less purchasing power than before.

A SURE RESULT OF INFLATION.

And who would obtain these newly-issued dollars? Not the laboring man, not the mechanic, not the farmer, not the merchant, but the capitalist. They would be hoarded and stored away, because confidence would be still more lessened, distrust still more intensified. It would only be when he supposed the greenbacks would be ultimately worthless that he would be willing to exchange them for something that the days of the state of th thing that he deemed more valuable.

INFLATION OF CREDIT WANTED.

What is wanted is rather an inflation of credit. Money is simply used as oil to lubricate the machinery of exchange. It is strangely forgotten that bank-notes, bills of exchange, and certificates of deposit serve efficiently the purposes of money. England gets along with less currency to-day than when its wealth was one-half its present amount. The daily exchanges in New York for 1875 exceeded $75,000,000. The real amount of money used in effecting these exchanges was but $2,491,440 per day. The amount of money actually used in effecting exchanges since 1854 has been but  $4_{10}^{+}$  per cent. to the ased in effecting exchanges since 1854 has been but 4½ per cent. to the amount exchanged. To make credit inflated, you must have some thing behind it that is fixed and immovable, something which will not fluctuate. The amount of currency depends, not upon the amount actually issued, but upon the rapidity of its circulation. When currency inflates, credit collapses. Inflation of currency always precedes a collapse of credit. Inflation of currency has never yet been a means of recovering from a crisis. This Administration, however, has attempted to unteach every thing taught by experience and reason. It has endeavored to cure the evil of inflation by still further inflation. Wise doctors! Indeed, it is quite necessary for the financial policy of the Administration to be ably vindicated.

The amount of currency in circulation is greater to day than ever

The Amministration to be adily vindicated.

The amount of currency in circulation is greater to-day than ever before in the history of this country, excepting the two last preceding years. To illustrate this fact, I present an official table showing the circulation since 1866 to November 1, 1875:

REDUCTION NOT DUE TO ACT OF JANUARY 14, 1875.

The slight reduction of twelve or fifteen millions of circulation is in nowise due to the wisdom of the act of January 14, 1875, which was in reality a measure of inflation, which was accepted as a measure of inflation, but rather to the laws of nature, which have brought to grief the short-sighted statesmanship of this Administration.

INFLATION INJURIOUS TO THE DEBTOR.

Mr. Chairman, another erroneous impression has possessed the minds Mr. Chairman, another erroneous impression has possessed the minds of many of our people, to the effect that inflation would help the debtor class, that resumption is especially unfriendly to that class; an error in every respect, as I can speedily demonstrate. If there were to be more money to-morrow, it would not be issued to the poor man, to the debtor class, but rather to the banker and the capitalist. Nobody would lend to the debtor, because the prospect ahead would indicate that when he returned the loan it would be worth less than when he becaused it. District would not only continue but increases. borrowed it. Distrust would not only continue, but increase. Mortgages overdue, notes matured, would be prosecuted to judgment, because the creditor partakes of that weakness of human nature known as selfishness, and would take this means to prevent the lessening of the debt already due before he collected it.

Not only that, but the capitalist would charge excessively to meet the risk of false values. The rich would rejoice in greater wealth; the poor would sorrow in greater poverty.

When confidence is restored the debtor's prospect brightens at once.

What he has becomes available; he can get credit for it; the demand for his labor or his products continually enhances. Honest currency is the only safety for an honest man.

THE INTERESTS OF ALL CLASSES IDENTICAL.

There is no real difference between any two classes in this country. Demagogism can erect no barrier which common sense cannot tear down. The creditor class is more than twice as numerous as the People constantly change from one to the other. creditor class. People constantly change from one to the other. The creditor to-day is the debtor to-morrow. There will never be a time when this argument cannot be urged as forcibly as now, that this measure or that measure is opposed to the interests of the debtor class. The man who embitters one class against another in a republic should be blistered to death in the hot wrath of the people. He makes war upon the sanctity of home and the peace of society. Capital and labor are mutually dependent and indispensable to each other.

THE NATIONAL BANKS NOT A MONOPOLY.

Mr. Chairman, another idea also has seized the masses, (not strangely, for it is encouraged by the utterances of many newspapers and public men,) to the effect that the national banks are a monopoly; that their interests are hostile to the general welfare, and that the people through the Government are paying them a bounty for prosecuting their business. This arraignment is unjust and ridiculous. It is calculated to produce much harm to the country, to provoke a contest which will defer an adjustment of this financial problem possibly for years. The banking system is free. Any person or persons can procure a charter and have notes issued to them for circulation. This is one of the admirable features of the otherwise detestable act of January 14, 1875. The national banks have paid to the Government since their organization more than $65,000,000, as appears from the following figures, the accuracy of which cannot be questioned:

Last year, as appears by these figures, they paid to the Government $7,305,134. The only money received by them from the Government is interest upon the bonds deposited as security for circulation. If this interest was not paid to the banks it would be paid to some other parties, perhaps to foreign holders.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman tell us how much is the interest paid by the Government?

Mr. WILLIS. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the inquiry at this particular point is not pertinent; for, no matter whether the interest be sixteen million or sixty million dollars per annum, it is interest due upon a legitimate constitutional indebtedness, and the Government.

est due upon a legitimate constitutional indebtedness, and the Government is bound to pay it, if not to the national banks, then to other parties who happen to hold the bonds.

CANNOT DISPENSE WITH THE BANKS.

Mr. Chairman, these national banks represent an aggregation of agency for enforcing resumption. Without these banks the country would be in a state of perplexity. They are no part of the Government machinery. They are at the mercy of the legislative power. The only relation the Government sustains to these banks is as an

The only relation the Government sustains to these banks is as an agency for the people, supplying them with currency and making it uniform and convertible into coin upon demand.

These notes are superior to the "greenbacks," because they have behind them a definite sum, a definite fund, making them redeemable in the absence of "greenbacks" in gold. If they (the banks) fail to comply with this provision you can go to the courts or to the Government, and obtain ample redress; but if the Government fails to meet its obligations, when its notes go to protest and you seek a remedy, the doors of the court-rooms are harred against you and there is no the doors of the court-rooms are barred against you, and there is no dependence save upon the caprice of whimsical law-makers, whose aptitude for finance is not such as to provoke enthusiastic admiration. All history testifies that the Government possesses neither the capacity nor the conscience to regulate and carry on the banking business. In doing so it cramps individual efforts; it thwarts the operation of natural laws, and it is controlled more frequently by demagogism than by sagacious statesmanship. And for the plain reason that it attempts the execution of inappropriate functions, it invades a domain which belongs to private enterprise.

Fund legal-tenders, gold alone remains with which to redeem the bank-notes. The bond makes the dollar absolutely good and the redemption on demand enforcible. Why, then, this outcry against all national banks, and whence does it come? Will not a national bank note dollar bring as much in gold as a roung grounders dellar. This note dollar bring as much in gold as your greenback dollar? This bitter warfare against innocent corporations is insanity born of demagogism, which can flourish only when the skies are clouded with

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SEELYE. I have the floor and will yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIS. It will take me more than that, I fear.

Mr. FORT. I should like to ask the gentleman a few questions.

Mr. WILLIS. When I get through, if I have time left, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I will yield now if it is not to come out of my time.

WHO ARE THE BLOATED BONDHOLDERS.

Mr. Chairman, this delusion about the banks is no stranger glory ing in its isolation for another, more unfounded and unreasonable still, intrudes itself. The holders of United States bonds are singled out for scornful assault and bitter vituperation. What are the facts? What! say the advocates of inflation and interchangeable currency? Shall we wear the yoke imposed upon us by bloated bondholders? Shall we for their sakes suffer the pangs of hunger and agony of want? No, let us break from this serfdom of money, this miserable monopoly of capital. Let this exclusiveness be done away with forever. is the communistic doctrine which men hitherto deemed sensible are now advocating. They suppose if new issues of greenbacks are issued they will be cast around impartially to all without consideration. They do not seem to realize that the only mode of getting out more greenbacks is for the Government to get deeper into debt, and then to issue more of them, as they did those existing, as further certificates of indebtedness.

But many advocates of more greenbacks are wiser than their reasoning would give seeming of. They in their unconscionable souls believe that in consequence of such inflation an era of artificial prosperity would ensue, and that then, in the feverish excitement of the hour, they could successfully prosecute doubtful enterprises or make available doubtful securities. Speculators overtaken by the vengeance of violated law in this way hope to retrieve their shattered fortunes. So the ignorant and designing, the latter ignorant in their wisdom, declaim against the bloated bondholders.

These bloated bondholders, Mr. Chairman, are the widows and orphans, the savings-banks, insurance and trust companies, which are the depositories of the poor. Such are the bloated bondholders; not the speculators of Wall street or State street. Those are purlieus where inflation holds eternal jubilee. Fluctuation is the food on which they thrive. Not more enchanted was Horace with his choicest with the provided the provided the street of the wines than are these men with the tidings of national repudiation.

THE CRIME OF INFLATION.

No man who loves honesty, who believes in substance rather than shadows, will for an instant tolerate the thought of inflation. Inflation is injurious to the farmer, injurious to the mechanic, injurious to the merchant. It benefits none but the gambler. It cannot be better described than in the scathing words of Juvenal: "It is a monster, whose vices are not redeemed by a single virtue."

SECTIONALISM

Mr. Chairman, more deplorable than even the tirade against national banks and bloated bondholders is the criminal effort on the part of men claiming to be statesmen to engender sectional strifes and create sectional differences. The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] informed the House that in the West and South there is a loud outcry for inflation; others inform us that eastern capitalists should be crushed out; that no banks are wanted in the West and South; others assert that the next President shall be a western man, while others insist he shall be an eastern man. This reference to sections is intolerable. We have but one country. There are in-flationists East, West, North, South; there are friends of honest currency everywhere; but wherever a political battle is fought, whether in the North or the South, the East or West, that army will triumph which demands prompt restoration of national credit. Honesty is peculiar to no section. Dishonesty finds provender everywhere; prisons are needed everywhere.

He who appeals to prejudices of section within the council halls of a republic sanctified by sacrifice and blood, should be stamped with the reproach which the infamy of such an act justly merits. The very magnitude of the country, its diversity in climate and production, serve, by making the several sections lean upon each other, to weld them into a complete, harmonious unity. Honesty is the true policy of the whole country; dishonesty is the sure peril of every section; inflation is crime, North, South, East, or West.

THE ACT OF JANUARY 14, 1875, NOT ADEQUATE.

But, Mr. Chairman, the exultation which our republican friends But, Mr. Chairman, the exultation which our republican friends manifest when allusion is made to the act of January 14, 1875, is not justified either by the results wrought by the measure or by the act itself. The honorable gentleman from Maine, who certainly will admit nothing unless compulsorily, says that while it fixes a date, it gives no adequate process. We propose to improve upon the republican policy. We will not content ourselves by making hollow promises without any intention of fulfilling them. For a mere declaration and empty boast we will take some positive step forward. We will and empty boast we will take some positive step forward. We will provide an adequate process. For uncertainty we will give certainty. For fluctuation we will give stability. For the elasticity which comes from caprice we will give an elasticity which comes from obedience to the law of supply and demand, spurning alike contraction and inflation as unmeaning phrases.

The honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] also observed that so long as the country was progressing reasonably well it was not practicable nor possible to set to work deliberately without the pressure of necessity to force specie resumption. He says we are situated as was Mr. Pitt, when, being asked why he did not bring in a bill for the suppression of the slave trade, declared that the merchants were too strong for the ministry. How unfortunate a weak memory! In 1865 McCulloch began contraction. In 1867 $44,000,000 had been withdrawn from circulation. The House voted almost manimously, there being but a minority of six, to sustain this policy. Prices advanced, confidence revived, and an early resumption was promised; but all at once a change of front occurred. The policy of honesty was abandoned. McCulloch was dismissed, and inflation of the currency followed. On the flood of a false prosperity the party of the Administration re-elected its Chief Magistrate. The pensioners upon the bounty of the Government made profligate expenditures of money, subsidized the press, and debauched the people. Then the laws of God were vindicated by a collapse of credit in 1873, which puts all precedents in eclipse.

Ah! my friends, instead of exclaiming, as did Pitt, "the British mer-chants are too strong for the ministry," the honorable gentleman should have expressed himself in this language: The Administration, re-enforced by gamblers and speculators, was too strong for an honest Secretary of the Treasury.

A HISTORICAL ALLUSION.

The honorable gentleman from Maine recalled the message of General Jackson, dated July 10, 1832, and exultingly asked what he would have thought of a great paper-money machine, with inconvertible currency dependent upon legislative caprice. Sir, he would have denounced it with that honest warmth which made him so terrible to his foes. Instead of creating one and then perpetuating it, as the republican party have done, he would have stamped it out forthwith on the heels of war. The features even of his statue in bronze at the other end of the Avenue tells us what to do. They command us to be honest and fearless, obedient to genuine democracy, and unforgiv-ing to those who "wear the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in."

NOW IS THE TIME TO SETTLE THE FINANCIAL QUESTION

Mr. Chairman, the time is apt for the adjustment of this financial question. No change can make matters worse. Property has shrunk to the lowest level. Money is too abundant. There is no special need for the greenbacks, and they can be better funded to-day than ever again. Our policy must be outspoken and fearless. The people justly regard us as cowards. We are afraid to act, and yet inaction is the approximation. is the supreme peril.

THE TRUE REMEDY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having effectually proven the responsibility of this Administration for the woe and distress which have been bursting this Administration for the woe and distress which have been bursting afresh upon us every year, appalling everybody, cramping and galling everybody and everything, and the unreasonableness of committing to them the labor of relief; having shown the jugglery of the act of January 14, 1-75, committing the Government to a pledge for the fulfillment of which it was quite unequal, I shall now proceed to point out that mode by which confidence can be restored and early prosperity assured. It is involved in no mystery. No profound darkness envelops it. There is no originality in it. It is the same mode that a practical business man under the like circumstances would adopt nominally costing a slight amount but in reality a boon freight. adopt, nominally costing a slight amount, but in reality a boon freighted with an annual harvest, yielding, not metaphorically, but literally a hundredfold.

Here is the precise state of the case. The Government issued its notes by which it promised to pay their face value in actual dollars; real constitutional dollars. They were forced upon the people, and are certificates of an indebtedness for property taken by force without process of law. These issues or certificates bear no interest, and are payable on no given day. They are a currency which the Government, overriding the restraints of law, compelled the people to use in the law of force. lieu of gold and siver; and the people acquiesced in the law of force and necessity. Now, the obligation of the Government, by virtue of every consideration of morality, prudence, and law, was and is to satisfy the holders of these notes at the earliest practicable moment by redeeming them in gold, or in what the holders are willing to accept instead thereof as a full equivalent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. The gentleman promised to answer my questions.
Mr. SEELYE. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS.]
Mr. WILLIS. I trust the House will grant me time to proceed with my remarks; I very seldom ask its indulgence.

Mr. FORT. I hope if the gentleman has his time extended he will answer my questions.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, the holders are willing, ay, eager, to accept a bond, at say 4 per cent., payable in forty years.

Who will object, then, to such redemption: the funding of the green-backs into a 4 per cent. forty-year bond? Is there any different result arising from an investment of $100 in a 4 per cent. bond than from an investment in a city bond, in a horse, in an acre of land, in from an investment in a city bond, in a horse, in an acre of land, in the stock of an insurance company, in a savings-bank deposit; if so, wherein? Let the terror-stricken inflationist answer. The property would remain in the country; if it did not, we could afford to pay any investor 4 per cent. If our bonds should go abroad, we become no poorer; value received would be paid for them. But the bonds should be issued in small multiples—$20, $50, $100, to $1,000. In this wise they would be diffused, owned everywhere by mechanics, farmers, retail dealers; they would be available as collaterals, and could be always made useful as conitat to undertake and carry on business be always made useful as capital to undertake and carry on business undertakings, whether banking or otherwise. They would be equal to their face value in gold coin, and the funding consequently would increase the available wealth of the country.

Nobody would realize any contraction. Everybody that has a greenback dollar worth eighty-six or eighty-seven cents could exchange it for a dollar bearing interest worth at least one hundred cents. How could the contraction operate harshly? How could the conversion of three hundred and eighty-two million nominal dollars worth eighty-six cents each into three hundred and eighty-two million real dollars worth one hundred cents each make the holders any poorer? Let us see. Suppose the nominal dollars in circulation were to re main the same, the present ability of every holder on demand to obtain a gold dollar would so appreciate their value that they would be equal to 15 per cent. increase in the circulation. Let the Government fund all greenbacks offered and they would be at par tomorrow, for no ordinarily intelligent American would sell a dollar for ninety-nine cents. The national-bank notes would appreciate in the same ratio. Why? Because redeemable in greenbacks; if not in greenbacks, in gold. If no gold could be had, then the Government would sell bonds on deposit as security for circulation, the sale of which would realize more in gold than the face amount of the notes.

Our banking system, though in many respects faulty, owing to oppressive exactions and restrictions to which it is subjected, is free. It embodies three indispensable conditions for sound and safe bank-

First. Absolute security for the bill-holder. Second. Convertibility into coin on demand.

Third. Uniformity; the same dollar bill welcomed with the same genuine warmth in Maine, Texas, and Oregon.

They are competent to increase issues 80 per cent. upon the amount of bonds they may deposit. So, no matter how extensive the demand, the banks can and will supply it by increasing circulation. Money is like all other commodities. It goes wherever it is most wanted. The bankers of London, Paris, and Berlin are not wholly witless and brainless. If they can obtain more profit by sending gold to the United States than by retaining it, they will do it, and that, too, not with hesitation, but with eager greed. The question may be urged, why have national banks been surrendering circulation? Because there is so much distrust, so much dullness; so little demand; because money is in such a still torpor, that there is no occasion for its use and its use yields no profit.

Why is there so small a quantity of gold? Because it is not used for circulation; if the need is limited, the supply accommodates itself to the need; it is cheaper in the United States than elsewhere; the market prices indicate not the value of gold, but the depreciation of our currency. Think you if the holders of gold could realize more here than elsewhere that it would not flow here until values were again equalized? Because, further, in pursuance of that law more again equalized. Because, in the product that have note ancient than commonwealths, a superior currency refuses to co-exist with an inferior currency; with a sensitiveness which it would be delightful to witness in society, it declines to abide with those who have not the good sense to appreciate it.

Make your greenback dollar worth one hundred cents; gold will forthwith become the boon companion of the bank-note; the eagles and half eagles, driven from the Republic by unconstitutional, short-sighted, unstatesmanlike legislation, will be coaxed back to the land from whose bosom they were unburied, and those henceforth mined and coined will not fly away. Whenever a dollar is needed, there will be a ready way to obtain it, it was whither it is wested a doce sill. and coined will not fly away. Whenever a dollar is needed, there will be a ready way to obtain it; it goes whither it is wanted, as does silk, jewelry, or any other article.

The shallow cry of contraction and the mad cry of inflation will be silenced. No law-maker will have the stupidity to name this amount or that amount as adequate to the demands of trade.

The law ordained by Omniscience—that of law and supply—will control the amount. When it is profitable for banks to issue more, they will respond by issuing more; when money is a drug upon the market, they will surrender a part of their circulation. If anybody wishes to enter into banking business, they can do so by compliance with the banking act; deposit 20 per cent. in excess of the amount of bank-notes desired; a business entirely open to everybody; just as open as dry goods, clothing, grocery, or any other business.

This twaddle about monopoly of national banks is unworthy of men; it is the invention of a demagogue hard-pressed for a campaign watch-word. It means mischief; it means war between labor and capital, in which labor always comes off second-best, for pending the struggle starvation becomes the ally of capital. Banking is now a free and open business, in which everybody can engage at will. Bank capital is taxed in excess of all other capital. The banks are now and always will be at the mercy of the law-making power, subject to the behests of public opinion.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD NOT BE BANKER.

Mr. Chairman, perpetuate the greenback system and enlarge it ac-cording to the 3.65 interconvertible scheme or the simple inflation scheme, make the Government sole banker, and it then will be intrenched behind the Government, be a part of the Government at once. It becomes a fierce omnivorous monster, always preying on the people, making officials the allies of gamblers and speculators, multiplying Black Fridays and Northwest corners, fluctuating values, creating Black Fridays and Northwest corners, fluctuating values, creating at pleasure, periods of prostration and prosperity, menacing and overtopping the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, arbitrarily fixing rates of interest by making money plenty or scarce, as selfishness and greed may suggest, controlling popular elections, debauching officials, and enabling the Administration and its friends to perpetuate themselves indefinitely in power. The President today has under his command an Army and Navy. Add to these the purse-strings, which you do if you make the Government a banker, and your liberties are at the disposal of a single man. To do this would indeed be a fitting climax of Grantism and not unworthy its latter-day history, a fitting accompaniment to its bayonet rule in the South, and its extortions through the North.

FUND THE GREENBACKS

Let the greenbacks be funded at the will of the holder; the Government does, forthwith, without detriment to any person in the land, what honesty requires, and pure, intelligent policy dictates; it abandons its unwarrantable, unconstitutional function as banker; it re-instates itself in the world's good opinion by completely restoring national credit; the legal-tender act becomes inoperative and dead, for greenbacks shall have ceased to exist; it leaves the amount of circulation to the law of supply and demand, and the question of specie-resumption to the banks and the people, who would solve the question of the people of the peo tion, without legislative aid, on terms of perfect justice. It repeals a law which fixes a date of resumption at 1879, by beginning the work of what is equivalent to resumption, what is more acceptable than resumption, what will effect the same end as resumption more speedily and without shock or violence, redemption of the dishonored notes of the Government, to-morrow.

EVIL OF HOARDING SPECIE.

There will not be occasion even to hoard specie on the part of the Government. To do this would be most undesirable, for it would in-

First. The evil of retaining on hand for an indefinite number of years an amount of unproductive capital sleeping in our coffers, yielding no interest.

Second. An unnatural mode of drawing coin to this country, which European governments and capitalists would oppose and if possible

Third. Even if 30 per cent, were to be hoarded and the work of re-demption inaugurated, it would progress until gold was exhausted, the gold scattered would again be hoarded by speculators and not go into circulation.

Sudden contraction would result and business prostration follow, so that the people, afflicted with another paroxysm of madness for the greenback, would insist upon further irredeemable issues, and Constitution, Supreme Court decisions, national honor, would be scorned as obstacles too trifling even to be treated with respect. The nation would by one fell blow be forced back another decade; into another and blacker midnight of want and bankruptcy. Specie resumption would be further away than before.

DISMISS ALL SCHEMES.

Remember only the obligation imposed upon our Government which cannot be shrunk from, the performance of which true statesmanship will not for a single hour defer. Pay off the forced loan in gold or in bonds voluntarily accepted in lieu thereof; resign the unlawful function of banking; remit to the people their rightful prerogative of resumption in their own way and own time.

THE RESULT OF FUNDING THE GREENBACKS.

Do this, and on the morrow, all the households of grief will be illumined with a prosperity relit; confidence will be every man's capital wherewith to begin anew his neglected enterprise; credit will be at hand for every honest man; every commodity will be invested anew with circulatory power; a dollar with sound faith behind it, will do the work of five; what money is wanted will come, where it is wanted,

Redemption is the pledge of plenty. Any other plan or mode will be the work of years. Meantime doubt wields its scepter, with speculation at its right hand. In the region of the unknowable none can know what might occur. The day redemption begins the work is accomplished, for the element of certainty, of fixed values, work is accomplished, for the element of certainty, of fixed values, straightway enters into and becomes the basis of all transactions. Redemption does not involve even additional taxation. Supposing the whole greenback debt funded, the interest would amount to less than fifteen millions per annum. The appropriations will be reduced this year, thanks to democratic ascendency, thanks to the manly leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] $30,000,000. But the greenbacks are so diffused that redemption would not be completed in two years, and the annual burden would be less than $8,000,000.

Now what does an irredeemable inconvertible currency cost us per

Now, what does an irredeemable, inconvertible currency cost us per

Poor victim of the greenback mania, heed! I shall say nothing of immigration, almost entirely checked; millions of laboring-men producing nothing; hundreds of millions of capital unemployed; but will regard one phase only. Our currency exceeds $730,000,000; its value varies from morn till eve; no two days elapse but it fluctuvalue varies from morn till eve; no two days elapse but it luctuates; every time it goes up 1 per cent. somebody, without labor, gains $7,300,000, somebody, without fault, loses it. Every time it goes down 1 per cent. the same result occurs. Find the aggregate of fluctuations throughout the year and it will appear that the annual loss to the nation is greater than $200,000,000 per annum. This amount we propose to save for the country at once. Money must be made stable. Redemption is a condition-precedent of stability.

AN UNPARTISAN APPEAL.

I implore you, gentlemen, you who love honesty more than party, whose souls are ungalled by the chains of partisanship, be for the moment unmindful of any supposed political advantage to result from your vote on this question; remember only the fame of the country which awaits vindication, the cry for shelter and bread which the passage of the measure I advocate would satisfy, the stagnated business and paralyzed energy of the country which simple justice to the nation's creditors would unclasp and make free.

This particular question of finance is a moral one, and can be justly decided only in the forum of conscience. We should spurn the treacherous voice of partisanship.

Mr. Chairman, the controlling element of this nation, the balance of power mightier than either party, are the tens of thousands of men who, sickened with political infidelities, care less for party names than do bees for the color of a flower; who, when republicanism merged into Grantism and lived without creed or purpose for ism merged into Grantism and lived without creed or purpose for spoils and plunder alone, refusing to accommodate itself to the question of the hour, deserted the republican party, exulting no less in its past glory than grieving at its present shame. This element believes in honest money, which means straightforward fulfillment of national obligations. Democracy, sickened with its defeats, mourning its falsity to true democratic principles, seemed to be inspired anew with its ancient devotion to a just faith. The memory of its dead leaders seems to be enshrined in the hearts of its living leaders. The liberal independent thought of the country to-day ranges itself with the democratic party because it accents its platform and itself with the democratic party because it accepts its platform and is democratic. If it remains democratic, if it forgets not its faith, this element will become its sure, permanent ally, and will give it overwhelming victory in November next.

THE PARTY ON TRIAL

If it belies the trust of the people; if in the moment when all hopes are centered upon it and cluster around it, it blasphemes the memory of its Jefferson, its Jackson, its Wright; if it spurns the counsel of its Tildens, its Bayards, its Kerrs, its Thurmans; if it cannonizes the erimes of republicanism, its repeated violations of plighted faith, its decision of a packed court, its shifting policies of alternate contraction and inflation, its empty promises made only to be broken, its career of jobbery and debauchery, its floating of stupendous speculations by voting for unlimited subsidies, increased issues of greenbacks, then it will lose all moral support, will justly perish, and its executioner will be an outraged and basely betrayed people.

I appeal to all; I care not what their affiliations are or what baners they salute. Strike hands, do something, take some positive step in the inauguration of a policy which will at once restore national credit and insure national prosperity, remembering always that in the same thing turpitude and advantage cannot co-exist.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] whether democrats hold the national-bank system, as a part of their financial policy? If it belies the trust of the people; if in the moment when all hopes of their financial policy?

Mr. WILLIS. Genuine democracy does. Free banking, in which everybody can engage at will on equal terms, is a cardinal democratic principle. I speak, however, for democracy, not the democratic party.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from New York to explain to the House why national-bank bills are better than legal-tender notes

Mr. WILLIS. I have already shown why in the course of my argument, because they are secured by a definite fund; and if greenbacks were out of the way would be convertible into coin on demand, which demand could be enforced. The greenback is a protested note, the payment of which can be enforced in no court or elsewhere.

Mr. FORT. I understand the gentleman from New York to say that money is too plenty. Then I wish him to tell the House why we should not withdraw national-bank notes and accumulate the gold we now pay to the national banks for the purpose of redeeming legal-

Mr. WILLIS. I will answer the gentleman. I repeat, money is too plenty to-day, because in the absence of all confidence there is no de-mand for it; but if we should withdraw national-bank notes we could not accumulate gold wherewith to redeem legal-tenders. The gold is paid to national banks, not as such, but as holders of Government bonds; if their circulation were surrendered the interest would still have to be paid. Then, too, the greenbacks are in protest and the national faith suffers. Fund and cancel greenbacks, national faith is vindicated.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] be extended.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended enough to give him an opportunity to answer my questions.

Mr. SEELYE. I should be very happy to have the gentleman finish his valuable remarks if it does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no control over the matter.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. It can be done by common consent.

Mr. WILLIS. The reason I ask is that my notes are in a very imperfect condition and unfit for the printer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] yield further to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS?]

Mr. SEELYE. I have no further time to yield.

Mr. FORT. I am sorry the gentleman could not have time to answer my questions.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope the gentleman from New York Mr. WIL-Lis] will have leave to print the residue of his remarks.

Mr. FORT. And to print answers to my questions.

No objection was made.

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened here to some very interesting and exceedingly able discussions of appropriations and the general questions of finance, in which, however, the utmost variety of opinion upon these important themes has been expressed. But I of opinion upon these important themes has been expressed. But I believe that, notwithstanding this seeming diversity, there is one point where the members of this House and the people who have sent us here will substantially agree. If it could be positively and everywhere known that our financial affairs had settled down upon some stable basis, a sigh of relief would be wafted from every quarter of the land. What our farmers, and mechanics, and laborers of all kinds most urgently need, what our manufacturers, and merchants, and traders of every sort are actually groaning for, is some sort of stability in the monetary affairs of the nation. Without such stability our whole industry is and must be affoat without a chart or compass, the sport of winds and waves. Upon this point I am sure we are all agreed.

But, if this be true, our views ought to harmonize still further; or a stable condition of our monetary affairs is not possible on the ground upon which we have sought to conduct them for the last fif-teen years. During this period the volume of our currency and its teen years. During this period the volume of our currency and its consequent value have depended, as they still do, upon acts of Congress, and these acts, various and contradictory as they sometimes have been, and uncertain as they always must be, introduce an element of instability in our finances which nothing can remove so long as we seek to regulate them in this way. Until the questions which now agitate us concerning our currency can be put beyond the control of Congress, and be left to regulate themselves, like winds and tides, by gravitation, it is simply impossible to have financial stability in the land.

Now, it may seem preposterous to have for agreement ways

Now, it may seem preposterous to hope for agreement upon any plan to put our currency upon a stable basis, but it is not difficult to see that all possible financial plans for us, comprehensively considered, resolve themselves into three, one of which we must take, and only

The first of these is the attempt to continue just as we are, with neither expansion nor contraction, a possibility which it is well for us to look fairly in the face and see whether it be actually such, or whether it be only a delusion and a snare.

Those who advocate the maintenance of our present financial policy essentially unchanged assert very different reasons in behalf of this policy and are innumerably divided in their methods of practically adjusting it. Some would maintain it as the only way to get back to specie payments and others as the best means of avoiding specie payments altogether. Some would do away with our bank-notes entirely and substitute greenbacks in their stead, maintaining the present volume unchanged, while others abound in what are called elastic expedients, by which the same currency may be stretched or shortened, as the widening or narrowing demands of trade may require. But the point of agreement in them all is this: that we have an American system of currency, different from that of all the rest of the world, a paper currency based not upon coin but upon the credit of the nation, and by this alone our permanent financial prosperity can be secured. It is not necessary to take up severally the various methods, actual or conceivable, for adjusting this system; since if the system itself is vitally defective that defect will attach to all its

Now, I affirm that the one defect in our present currency, a defect which penetrates it through and through and renders it forever in-capable of performing the functions of a sound money, is that it is a carpane of performing the functions of a sound money, is that it is a currency which has originally cost no labor; it rests upon no solid ground of industry, and therefore when you undertake to pay for labor with it labor is cheated, and the industry of the nation, being dishonestly paid, becomes in consequence prostrate and paralyzed. In other wor's, we have fancied that we could actually measure the labor of the land by that which has no labor in it; we have taken a piece of paper which costs no labor, and which may be duplicated and multiplied to any extent without labor, and have supposed that we could make this the actual standard of value and wealth, when the could make this the actual standard of value and wealth, when the one essential thing without which value disappears and wealth becomes a nullity is labor. There is no possible way in which the currency of a nation can be a stable representative of the industry or the wealth of a nation unless that currency be a commodity which costs labor to produce it and is worth what it has cost for some other use than currency. It may be any commodity you please, if it have these characteristics; it may be wampum or bullets, as among the earliest colonists of Massachusetts; it may be salt, or tin, or tea, or cowryshells, as among some Asiatic and African peoples to-day; or it may shells, as among some Asiatic and African peoples to-day; or it may be silver and gold, as from the earliest history has been the case in the civilized world; but whatever it is, it must possess these two qualities, of being intrinsically desirable to possess and equally difficult to obtain, or it cannot be truly money or furnish a truly stable currency for the people who employ it. The simple reason for this, which makes its truth apparent to every sound eye, is that these two elements are exactly what give value to anything; in other words, are exactly that which constitutes wealth, and, while all wealth is not money, there cannot be money in any true sense which is not wealth.

money, there cannot be money in any true sense which is not wealth.

Now, I will not argue the advantages of gold and silver for this purpose, for these are too plain to need arguing. Neither do I wish to bring any charge of disadvantage against a paper currency which represents its fixed amount of gold and silver, into which it may be turned at the option of the holder, for such a currency has its obvious which I know of nought to contravene. currency which is only a promise to pay that is never fulfilled, a currency whose only value is furnished by the command or even by the credit of the government which issues it, a currency which can be produced to any extent without labor, and which has no possible produced to any extent without labor, and which has no possible use for anything except as currency, is not only inconvenient and disadvantageous, but must be disastrous wherever employed. Such a currency, unstable itself, renders everything else unstable; it unsettles all values; it disturbs every kind of business; it obliges that trade should be done with a broader margin of profit and loss, and thus enlarging the field of speculation it extends in an equal degree the bounds of bankruptcy; it always has been, whenever tried, a most fruitful source of evil, and, from the nature of the case, its results must be always evil. sults must be always evil.

Here, then, in a word, is the exact and hopeless difficulty with this currency of ours. It undertakes to pay for industry with that which has no industry in it, and this is a fraud upon industry which, howhas no industry in it, and this is a fraud upon industry which, however cloaked or long concealed, will at length come to light and claim its retribution. "My Lord Cardinal," said Anne of Austria to Cardinal Richelieu one day, "My Lord Cardinal, God does not pay at the end of every week or month; but at the end He pays." To individuals this payment may be carried over beyond this world, but nations suffer here and now for their faults and follies, as well as for their crimes. Why, Mr. Chairman, is any eye so blind as not to see the dire consequences of this currency of ours as now apparent in the land? consequences of this currency of ours as now apparent in the land? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] the other day pictured in sepulchral tones the funereal gloom in which our industries seemed to him enshrouded; but what has brought so sad a state to pass? Why this "suspended industry," and "curtailed production," and "enforced idleness" which, in the language of the gentleman, has added so "fearfully to the list of suicides, crowded insane asylums with suddenly-impoverished patients, and opened as their only refuge station-houses and houses of correction to thousands of men and women who would find happiness in enduring the penalty of the primal curse could they be permitted to earn their bread in the sweat of their brow." We still have this "philosophical currency," this "glorious currency," "the best currency in the world," of which the greedy foreign nations can never deprive us; and these, upon which the gen-tleman has descanted, are its legitimate results. To what else are tleman has descanted, are its legitimate results. To what else are they, to what else can they be referred, even upon his own showing Does he, does any man, believe that "the financial policy inaugurated by President Johnson's Secretary of the Treasury" is responsible for this state of things? But this state of things does not occur till from six to eight years after that financial policy had been abandoned. Does the gentleman believe, is he serious when he ascribes any part of this condition to what he terms "the ill-judged act providing for the resumption of specie payments on the list of January, 1879?" But these results began long before that act was passed or even proposed, and if anybody does not know that they are altogether independent of that act he needs something more than arguments to give him knowledge. It is not light which he lacks, but an eye. This condition is not at all an unnatural result of a currency like ours. It is a result which has always attended such a currency. It is the result which has been predicted over and over again, as sure to follow the attempt to pay for labor in anything which is not the product of lathis state of things? But this state of things does not occur till from attempt to pay for labor in anything which is not the product of la-bor, and this result can never be remedied by any device which does not reach to the very root of the evil itself.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this result is not going to be changed, cannot, from the very nature of the case, be changed by making this currency interconvertible with bonds, a scheme made so famous by the ersistent advocacy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and which have sometimes almost thought he has intended to present as an exquisite piece of irony, or, perhaps, a magnificent piece of burlesque, in which the ridiculous results of a certain theory of the currency might appear in all their absurdity. But if this be a sober scheme, soberly presented, I venture to turn aside for a moment from the direct line of my discussion to ask what it really means. according to the scheme, are to be converted into bonds and bonds according to the scheme, are to be converted into bonds and bonds are to be converted into dollars, interchangeably and perpetually, as the exigencies of business shall require; but what is a dollar, and what are the bonds? Perhaps a dollar means nothing, is only a word with no more significance than those macutes which Montesquieu tells us the inhabitants of the West African coast employ in their reckoning; but I suspect the gentleman would hardly allow that his scheme stands upon this level. And yet if a dollar means anything—I will not say a definite weight dayly stanged of reals are signed. reckoning; but I suspect the gentleman would hardly allow that his scheme stands upon this level. And yet if a dollar means anything—I will not say a definite weight, duly stamped, of gold or silver, but if it have any conceivable meaning—then this interconvertible-green-back-and-bond scheme, if it be anything other than a gigantic folly, is a stupendous fraud. Let us see. The gentleman surely will not claim that this piece of paper called a greenback is a dollar, for the greenback itself claims to be nothing of the sort. All that the greenback claims to be is a promise to pay a dollar, and this promise to pay a dollar cannot surely be the same thing as a dollar, except upon that system of logic by which a horse-chestput is proved to be the same system of logic by which a horse-chestnut is proved to be the same thing as a chestnut horse, a system of logic with which I have no doubt the gentleman often amused himself, as we all have done, in the sports of boyhood, but by which that remarkable school of political economists which he so often quotes actually guides itself in the speculations of mature life.

The greenback is a promise to pay; does this mean anything? Shall it be fulfilled? Yes, says the gentleman, we will redeem it in bonds. A given number of greenbacks shall have in return a given number of bonds. These promises to pay shall be transferred thus into dollars? No, but they shall find their full equivalent in bonds. But what then are the bonds? Why, they are only promises to pay; promises to pay, moreover, dollars again, just as the greenbacks are, and to be fulfilled and redeemed by being converted, when it comes to a pinch, into greenbacks again. One promise is paid by a second, and the second is redeemed by renewing the first, by which process, we are gravely told, our financial prosperity shall be all that we desire! But what has become of the dollar in all this jugglery between greenbacks and bonds? Where is "the little joker" in this amazing game of thimble-rigging in which a great government like ours is soberly urged to engage? The dollar, whatever it is—and I will not quarrel here about its meaning—the dollar is nowhere to be found. He to whom it belonged, when seeking for his own, finds himself the victim of a cheat, and the government which palms off such a procedure upon him becomes a party to a fraud. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that some very extravagant financial theories are afloat among us, but I suspect that a parallel for this interconvertible-greenback-and-bond scheme cannot be found outside of a madhouse.

And yet every possible contrivance to patch up our present system, while the system itself is left essentially unchanged, necessarily involves more or less of a delusion; for the very groundwork of the system is faulty, and the fault remains, whatever its adjustments. Since the payment of labor with anything which is not a payment in kind—i.e., with anything which is not at bottom a payment in labor—is only a pretended and not a real payment, no legislation, no devices can change this pretense into a reality, any more than acts of Congress or contrivances of men can change any other falsehood into a truth. It is therefore only a puerile delusion to suppose that efforts to strengthen the so-called credit of the Government would help this matter in the least.

The credit of the Government creates no values. All that it can do is to certify to the value which honest industry has already created. The credit of the Government certifies by its coinage to the value of a given coin, but the value is in the weight and fineness of the metal coined, and not in the stamp which gives it currency. All the credit of the Government could no more give iron pyrites the value of gold than could the credit of the Government make reams of pasteboard into regiments of fighting men. Labeling the pasteboard with the titles of an army and solemnly pledging the faith of the Government that it should perform all the functions of an army would be no greater an absurdity than that into which we have fallen in the treatment our paper currency, and solemn appeals to sustain the credit of the Government would be just as appropriate in reference to one of these shams as the other. The exact and all-important point, which, though often overlooked, gentlemen should not here forget, is that governmental credit, instead of sustaining the Army, the money, the institutions, the laws of a land, needs itself first of all to be sustained by these. The credit of a government is like the credit of a man, priceless if it rests on truth, but worse than worthless other

But if it be impossible to build a stable structure, however contrived, on the basis of our currency as it is, any further extension of this currency, which is the second of the three possible courses I have referred to, would be of course the wildest infatuation. Such an extension could only end in an increase of the ills we suffer. Moreover, unless all history is false, and every financial law a fallacy, and every deduction from the past respecting the future an act of folly, any further inflation of our currency would be followed by national repudiation. Little as we like the word—and it is a healthy sign if it shocks us—yet, if we should go on inflating our currency, we could no more avoid repudiation than we could avoid the plunge of the cataract after we had passed its brink. Gentlemen may talk about the experience of other times and peoples as not applicable to ours, and may dream of what a great nation like the United States can accomplish, but gravitation guides the great worlds as resistlessly as it does the atoms, and the greater a nation is in industry and wealth, the more conspicuously must it follow those laws of wealth, which to the wise statesman are as clear and controlling as to the wise man of science are the laws of nature itself.

But we are to be congratulated on the fact that there is little open and direct advocacy of inflation in any quarter just now. It is to be hoped that we have learned something from our experience and discussions, and the result is auspicious if we have reached a point where a further inflation of our currency, however pessible, has ceased to be an immediate probability.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that there are only three possible courses to be taken respecting our currency, only one of which can be wise. And if a further inflation is certain to bring upon us all the disgrace and disaster of national repudiation, and if our present system, defrauding labor, as it necessarily does, of its honest rights, must, in the long run, paralyze industry, giving rise thus to innumerable delusive makeshifts and fraudulent expedients, by which we endeavor to cheat ourselves or others with the notion that the semblance of a thing is the same as the reality, then the resumption of specie payments, the only course left, will be sought by every wise man. But hic labor, hoc opus est. How to do this is, I am free to admit, our hardest financial problem. To see that a further inflation means repudiation, and that the attempted continuance in our present course is the continued reign of financial disaster and ruin, is much easier than to discover the sure path to the only safe end. But a wise and practical people like ours ought to be able to solve this problem, and a brave people like ours ought not to be discouraged before it.

We shall be aided toward this solution if here also we classify all the possible ways in which any one might suppose it could be reached. And, in doing this, we shall find that as there are only three possible courses for us to take in the general administration of our national finances, only one of which is wise, so there are only three possible ways of attempting specie resumption, only one of which is certain to succeed. I say only three possible ways, for I exclude the thought that our currency, unless still further expanded, can be repudiated, as an impossibility.

The first of these ways is to hoard coin until a sufficient amount has been gathered to make sure that resumption would not be a failure. This is a favorite method with some, who find easy arguments in its support, but I suspect the difficulties in its way are too great to allow it to succeed. For, obviously, it would be a very costly procedure. The gold would have to be bought in order to be stored, and the increasing scarcity caused by the increasing hoard would resistlessly increase the market price of the gold. What shall be said, too, of the interest upon the accumulations during the time of their progress and what of the unsettling of monetary values all over the world which such a procedure would include? It may safely be said that such an accumulation of specie as would be necessary to secure payment in coin for our present currency would produce such a financial pressure here and elsewhere that we should be forced to stop before we had finished. And thus this method of resuming specie payments is not really a possible one, though at first it might seem to be such. Moreover, if this were possible there is another way, not only easier, but incalculably more economical.

The second possibility is a return to the method so wisely adopted at the close of the war, of gradually retiring and destroying these legal-tender notes out of the superabundant revenues of the Government—a process which I hold to have been the wisest financial step the Government has taken since these notes were made a legal tender; and which, had it been continued as it began, would have brought us back to specie payments and prosperity long ago. But though our surplus revenue is not now sufficient to permit, without an increase of taxation, a hopeful re-inanguration of this method, we should not forget that such a course, could it be pursued, would inevitably bring us to specie payments again. Specie payments would return at once, as we all know; no power could hinder their return if the currency which first drove them out did not still hold them back. You might as well keep the tides of the ocean from returning when gravitation requires it. And just as surely and as clearly, specie payments can no more return until our present currency has been reduced than can the sunlight fill a darkened chamber till the shutters have been taken down.

But if we are to have a reduction of our currency, as national honor and national prosperity and, I fear we must also say, as national safety require, and if this cannot be done by withdrawals from our surplus revenue, no other way remains than to exchange this currency for the interest-bearing bonds of the nation, payable, principal and interest, in coin. And thus we find, at the conclusion of our survey, that of all possible methods of dealing with our currency, only one is wise, and I venture to say also that, if this be rejected, we have no practicable alternative to repudiation. We may as well face this alternative first as last. We must fund our greenbacks or repudiate them, for we cannot keep on bearing the burdens, the increasing burdens, with which this delusive currency oppresses us. I do not believe we shall repudiate. I have faith in the nation. And therefore I would hope that the Congress of the nation, by its original convictions I trust, and otherwise by the unfaltering voice of the people, will speedily set forward some measure for funding our present legaltender currency, the only measure which can give us monetary soundness again.

We must reduce the actual volume of our present currency in order to make specie payments possible. If it pinches, if it pains us, if it plunges us in distresses which for the time may seem intolerable, we have got to bear it if we get back to specie payments and a healthy state of business again. And if we are anything but children, if we are a wise people, who can see our sickness and its remedy, we shall not shrink from the medicine or the knife needful to make us sound again. We are not children; we are not a nation of moon-struck dreamers; our people can, they do see the difference between a dancing bubble and a building on a stable basis, and no party, whatever its name, can long maintain its hold upon them, which undertakes to claim that a promise to pay which cannot be pushed to a fulfillment—no matter by whomsoever or whatsoever made—can be equivalent to the actual payment. Our laboring classes, the toiling millions by whose industry alone comes national wealth, are too intelligent to have permanently palmed off on them promises to pay which are never paid, and because the doctrine, by whatever name it may be called, that industry can be paid with aught which is not itself the product of industry, is a delusion; the workmen of the land will assuredly come to see it as it is, and will render to whatever party represents it the retribution it deserves.

Mr. DURAND obtained the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Seelye?]

Mr. DURAND. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Seelye] to say that Congress has no power to regulate values.

If the gentleman will allow me to correct the terms Mr. SEELYE. If the gentleman will allow me to correct the terms in which he puts his question I will hear him. What I did say was, not that Congress had no power to regulate values, but that it had no power to create values. Does the gentleman mean to stand here and say to the Congress and country that Congress can make values?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Silver has depreciated in the market 10 per cent. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] hold that we must add to its value by adding gold or something to bring it up that 10 per cent?

Mr. SEELYE. The gentleman says that silver has depreciated. Why? Because it takes less labor to obtain a pound of silver now that it did four years ago; that is the reason why silver has depre-

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Where is your standard? Where is your dollar

Mr. SEELYE. I will refer the gentleman to the Revised Statutes of the United States for the definition of a dollar.

Mr. DURAND. Mr. Chairman, representing in this House, as I do in part, one of the great States of the Union, a State noted for its surprising diversity of resource and production, for its extensive mining, agricultural, and commercial interests, I feel that I would be recreant t the trust reposed in me by the people who have commissioned me to represent them on this floor if I did not raise my voice in support of a sound, stable, honest currency, and if I did not upon every proper occasion exert my influence in favor of such a governmental policy as will tend soonest to restore business prosperity and build up shattered industries. An overpowering conviction of what I deem to be my simple duty in this regard must be my excuse for forcing my views in relation to this question, so vital to the future prosperity of the American people, upon the attention of this deliberative assembly so soon after becoming a member of it. There are so many different views entertained in regard to the question of what money we shall have, and how large a volume of money it is necessary to have in circulation, in order that the business of the country may go on in a prosperous manner, that it seems to me to be the part of wise statesmanship to divest it as much as possible of all merely political or partisan coloring, and consider the subject purely as a national, eco-nomic one, upon the correct solution of which depends all our future commercial prosperity as a nation.

The Constitution gives to Congress the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. What is the reasonable and generally accepted meaning of the term, to coin money, and from what standard shall its value be regulated? Webster defines coin to be "a piece of metal on which certain characters are stamped making it legally current as money," and until we found ourselves surrounded by unfortunate financial complications growing out of the issue of a paper currency by the Government, I take it that that was the definition generally given to it by a large majority of the people and by a large majority of the most distinguished jurists and lawyers in this country. I therefore advance the proposition that when the Government coins money it must first select some article or metal which, by reason of its scarcity, or by reason of its being the representative of so much labor, or for some other peculiar reason, has a known, acknowledged in-trinsic value in and of itself, and that, having agreed upon some such specific metal or article as a basis of value, it may then put the stamp of the government upon it, and thereby certify to the world that in a given coin there is a given amount in value of the article from which the coin is made, and that it shall therefore be considered from which the coin is made, and that it shall therefore be considered as entitled to pass current as money. In other words there must be some specific thing which by general consent has a given value, and from which, used as a standard for measuring values, we may estimate everything else. I think the correctness of this proposition will be conceded by everybody, for, if it were not so, we could never estimate the value of anything, because we would have no standa: d by which to test nor rule by which to measure values. If it be true then that we must have some standard or unit of value from very necessity the next question that presents itself is, what shall that standard that we must have some standard or unit or value from very neces-sity, the next question that presents itself is, what shall that standard be? Shall it be iron or tin or copper or some article peculiar to a given locality; shall it be legislative faith or shall it be gold or sil-ver or some article which the whole civilized world with whom we trade and deal agree upon as being the basis or unit of value, and from which all other values are determined?

It seems to me that a careful consideration of this subject can lead to but one conclusion, and that is that we should adopt that article as a standard of value which is recognized by the other nations of the world, and that from that standard we must maintain a quality of money which shall be certain in value instead of fluctuating and on moley when shall be certain in value instead of nuctuating and unstable. Were we a nation isolated from the world, and had we no dealings or transactions with any other nation; was all our business conducted by and with our own people and within our own borders; did we owe no foreign debt which we are obliged to pay in money estimated from a gold standard, we might possibly be able to determine upon some system of finance which would be peculiarly local or peculiarly American, a non-exportable currency, one in which no one but our own citizens in our own country would have any interest. But, whether fortunately or unfortunately, this state of things does notexist. We owe a foreign debt to-day, national railroad corporations and private debts included, estimated at not far from $2,500,000,000, the annual interest on which amounts to about $150,000,000, all of which, both principal and interest, this Government and the corporawhich, so the principal and the cest, his covernment and the corpora-tions and citizens of this country must pay in a money the value of which is estimated from a gold standard. In other words, we must pay it in gold; and we do not pay it and cannot pay it in a non-exportable currency unless we make that non-exportable currency equal in value to gold; and if we do this with a currency worth 14 per cent. less than it professes to be worth, which is the condition of our currency to-day, we are compelled to use what we call $171,000,000 in order to pay $150,000,000 of interest.

Then again we imported during the fiscal year ending June 30,1875, goods from foreign countries amounting in round numbers to the sum of $550,000,000. These also we were compelled to pay for in money estimated from a gold standard, taking of our "non-exportable" currency the sum of $627,000,000 to pay for these goods. So that besides paying the value of the goods we were obliged to pay in addition the sum of $77,000,000 for the difference between the value of our money as it really is when measured or estimated from the gold standard of the world with which we are compelled to deal and the value stamped or written upon its face. With such facts as these staring us in the face and confronting us in every department of commerce and trade how can it be possible that we should fail to see the necessity of adopt-ing such a line of policy as shall surely bring our currency to a specie

Our people are a commercial people; our trade extends over the world. We buy and sell in all parts of the habitable globe, and in making exchanges and in settling balances we are obliged to use in payment such a standard of money as is recognized by the nations with which we deal. Premising, therefore, that there is a certain and fixed standard from which to estimate the value of money, it follows that if any commercial country has a quality of money which though professedly up to the required standard is as a matter of fact really below it, and is for that reason what we denominate a depreciated currency, then that country is in all foreign business transactions put to a disadvantage equal, or nearly equal, to the amount of such de-preciation. Some basis of value must be recognized by us as a commercial people; and, unless we are willing to deprive ourselves of the full benefits which accrue from trade and commerce, we must adopt one that is uniform with that of the other great countries of the world with which we deal. The beads and tinsels of the Indians, and the articles passing current among the semi-civilized and barbarous nations, may be and are used by them in their own countries as money, but in the commercial world and among a commercial people they are valueless. Their value is wholly and entirely local—not universal; and therefore they are wholly unfit for circulation as money except in the particular locality where used.

Now, if our articles of trade were limited to such as are produced in this country, or did we only seek to raise such quantities of the different productions natural to our soil and climate as are required for the use and subsistence of our own people, then I grant that we might determine upon some basis of value peculiarly local and maintain it, whether such basis should be a given amount of iron, or tin, or copper, only so it be a commodity or article in the permanency of which as a basis of value, or starting-point from which to make an estimate of value, the people of the country would have confidence. But so long as we trade with the world this is simply impossible So long as we trade with the world we must do business as the world does, in the way of the world and in the money of the world. does, in the way of the world and in the money of the world. And if the money of the world is gold, or if gold is the basis from which is estimated the value of the world's money, we must, from very necessity, conform to the same standard or be continually subjected to the disgrace and humiliation and pecuniary disadvantage which always attach to a depreciated currency. Say what we will, enact whatever laws we may to suit particular occasions or to meet the apparent necessities of business, and yet we are continually confronted with the fact that the value of money can only be regulated by one arbitrary rule, and that a dollar in money is not what A or B or C or the people of any particular locality may call a dollar, but it is a dollar only if it represents that sum reckoned from the standard or specific article agreed upon by the commercial world as the basis from which the value of all other things is estimated. In other words, a dollar is that amount of money which will buy a dollar's worth of anything that is for sale anywhere in the world—as well in Paris as in Washington, in London as in New York.

Holding this view, I maintain that, so far as the Government is concerned, it should establish the general standard of value recognized by the world, and that it should then remit to the people themnized by the world, and that it should then remit to the people themselves, under wise, prudent, business-like restrictions, the right to issue and to keep afloat as much currency or paper money as they, the people, consider it necessary to have in order to do the business of the country, only providing, however, that such currency shall always be kept up to the required standard in value and be redeemable at the pleasure of the holder in the money which the paper purports to represent. Admitting that the General Government has a right in times of peace, under the Constitution, to issue a currency.

to put afloat paper promises to pay and call it money, (which right, I may add by way of parenthesis, is doubted by some of the ablest constitutional lawyers in this country)—admitting, I say, that the Government has the constitutional right so to do, I deem the exercise of such a right would be fraught with dangers so great as to appall every intelligent, patriotic, thinking man who would give the subject that attention which it demands. To authorize any government to issue paper promises to pay and call it money, with no limit to its volume and no provision for its redemption save such as is prompted by legislative wisdom or legislative faith, is to put the entire business of the country in a condition of constant doubt and uncertainty; from the very nature of things, it would lead to extravagance and frauds, and from thence to financial ruin and utter bankruptcy. When sought to be applied to mere business transactions, I have no confidence in legislative faith, especially when we consider how frequent are the changes in the personnel of the Congress of the United States, with the great diversity of opinion and of interests shown or represented by the members of it. We must know that what would be considered by our Congress to be a safe and proper theory upon which to conduct the money-issuing power of the Government would be considered utterly unsafe and improper by some succeeding Congress; and therefore, however honest a legislative body may be, legislative faith is controlled by so many and such varied causes, that no solid foundation of business can be laid upon it.

So far as business is concerned I have more confidence in the united opinion and judgment of a great people who, by honest industry and toil, have made all the greatness which America has achieved, and who are the owners both at law and in equity of every dollar that finds its way into the public Treasury, than I have in the judgment and personal responsibility of any body of public officials who may be elected to look after the political interests of the country. The personal responsibility which ownership imposes upon a man is lost in a legislative body; and, therefore, if any legislative body is given the power to issue currency at will, it cannot be expected that the same economy or care would be shown as would be if the person or body of persons doing the act were to be held to a strict accountability and a personal responsibility for the payment of the promises made and to the redemption of the currency put afloat. Every inducement to issue a larger and still larger volume of it would be held out; every enterprise and job, whether of a public nature or private, would be urged in order to get money from the Treasury; and a paid lobby would stand ready to swear to the necessity for this appropriation and for that; and inasmuch as money could be made by a simple vote authorizing this sum or that sum to be issued, extra issues would in the very nature of things be made, until the volume would be so great that no man could comprehend its magnitude, and then, speedily, national and individual insolvency would come, and bankruptcy and crushing disaster and disgrace and repudiation.

Why, sir, it seems to me that a concession by the people to the Government of the right to put into circulation an unlimited quantity of paper money, to be controlled in volume only by the will of the national Legislature, is a grant so monstrous in its power to do evil, so inimical to all purity in the public administration of governmental affairs, and so dangerous and deadly in its effect upon all the solid, enduring, permanent business interests of the country, that if we will but give the matter that careful consideration which it deserves and strip it of the sophistry and special pleading by which it has been surrounded, we will not hesitate to flee from this maelstrom which is waiting to ingulf us. As I have already remarked, let the Government fix the standard by which the value of money is to be measured. Let it be uniform with the standard agreed upon by the other great commercial nations of the world, and then remit to the people the right to conduct their own business in their own way, including the power under safe restrictions to issue such an amount of currency as they choose, always providing, however, that it shall be a par currency and redeemable at the pleasure of the holder in the money of the world. I do not believe any other way is safe. Inasmuch as the people earn all the money, produce all the wealth, bring into being whatever is of any value in this country, why are they not better suited to conduct the banking business of the country under such regulations as the Government may in its wisdom impose than are the public officials of the Government? Can they not do it more economically, more satisfactorily to themselves, and more prudently?

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me as though the Government ought to begin to unload and disencumber itself of all species and classes of business which can be safely remitted to the people. From the great accretion of business which has been going on, thereby creating a necessity for new agencies and commissions and offices, one would almost be led to the conclusion that the Government considered the people unable to conduct their own business, and that their best interests could only be subserved by establishing a sort of guardianship over a people who have by toil and privation accumulated all the wealth of this country; who have cleared away the forests, built comfortable homes and churches and school-houses; who have laid off fertile fields, and made of America as grand and beautiful a picture as ever embellished an advanced civilization. This is not as it should be. I am willing and anxious to trust the people. I believe that they can conduct the commerce and trade and the business and industrial interests much more safely, satisfactorily, economically, and prudently than any Congress they can elect, no matter how honest or how able. Had this theory been adopted and carried out, I do not believe we should have the paralyzation of business which is now complained of. Had the people been allowed to conduct their own business, I do not believe there would now be one single subsidized railroad or other corporation in America. Several hundred well-fed public officials would long since have been relieved of their sinecures and invited back to the modest and exhilarating pursuits of private The salaries of the President and some other public officials would never have been doubled up, back pay would have been held in reprehension, and fraud and peculation upon the Government would neither have been greeted with a silent tongue nor a benignant smile.

To conclude this branch of the argument I contend that the Government, if not already inhibited by lack of power under the Constitution to exercise it, should, for prudential reasons and for the protection of the people and for the safety and prosperity of our business interests, be finally and forever denied the right to issue one dollar in currency, and that the entire banking business of this country, including the issuance and floatage of currency, should be by proper and just legislation remitted to the people, (if it has not already been done,) who, under the necessities created by the laws of trade, which are as immutable as the laws of nature, may issue and keep afloat as much money in the shape of currency as they can maintain at a specie standard in value, and as is in their judgment required in order properly to carry on the trade, commerce, and business of the country.

I have thus far, in treating the subject under consideration, laid down what I believe to be the only practical, safe, honest, consistent theory by which the people can have at all times a sound currency, unchangeable in value, in volume suited to the laws of trade, and redeemable upon demand in the money of the world; but this theory has not been carried out by the Government. Under a supposed neces sity existing when a great civil war was in progress, against the earnest advice and protestations of those who saw the dangers which would grow out of the exercise of such a power, and against the judgment of those who urged grave constitutional objections against it, the Government did diverge from the previously recognized rule in this regard, and issued a large volume of paper promises to pay. It was made a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duwas made a legal tender for an deols, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and was put affoat among the people with the impress of the Government of the United States upon it as money, and to-day, many years after the war has closed, years of great prosperity and national growth, with the greatest fertility of soil and diversity of production, and with a people ready to honor any draught made upon their patriotism and intelligence, we find ourselves with a depreciated currency, with complaints of par-alyzation in business, and with most persistent demands for relief by public legislation. We find ourselves with a currency, national and bank, amounting at its face value in round numbers to the sum of $800,000,000, but which, by reason of a policy which I consider unwise and unjustifiable in all its parts and criminal in many of its parts, is in such a depreciated condition that it is in reality only worth $688,000,000; and the people who own it, who have been compelled to take it in payment for their manufactured articles, for their farm produce, and for their toil, are to-day $112,000,000 poorer than they would be if the Government had pursued a wise, business-like, honest, economical policy in regard to the interests committed to it by a confiding people

Now, sir, what is the reason for this condition of things? Is it because, as intimated by the distinguished gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] the democratic party has been an obstacle in the way of specie resumption? Why, sir, from the very first issue of this paper currency until the Forty-fourth Congress assembled, the democratic party has not had control of a single Department of the National Government, and the whole combined strength of the party has not had sufficient influence with the Administration to secure the appointment of any single officer of the Government—not even a postmaster at the humblest cross-roads in the humblest county in the land. And is the republican party entitled to any credit, as the same gentleman inti-mated it was, for not having a larger volume of this depreciated cur-rency afloat? Why, sir, it was only two years ago that both Houses of the American Congress—one branch of which was presided over by the gentleman himself—having an overwhelming republican ma-jority, and with scarcely enough Representatives of the democratic party to entitle them to a respectful hearing when they entered their solemn protests against such acts of the majority as they deemed to be unwise, passed an act of positive inflation, and the country was only saved from the calamity of an additional issue of depreciated currency by the firmness and determination of one man, who, by the exercise of a power vested in him under the Constitution, saved the American people from the humiliation and infamy which the meas-when the measure, if it had passed into a law, would have brought.

So, sir, when the facts of history are challenged they show that if any political party is to be held accountable it is the republican party, and the republican party alone that is responsible for the peculiar currency we call "greenbacks." It is that party that called it into being, that passed every act authorizing its issue, that put it into circulation among the people, that has compelled every American citizen to recognize it as money in all his business affairs, and it is that party, and that party alone, that is responsible for its volume and for all the measure of depreciation and of irredeemability attached to it.

In further confirmation of what the facts of history show in regard to our peculiar currency and who is responsible for it, I beg to refer to that most orthodox of republican newspapers, the Indianapolis Journal, which, in its issue of January 21, 1876, says:

The quietus to all this quackery is a simple statement of facts. The republican party is the greenback party of the past, the present, and the future. The party that created greenbacks is the one to protect them.

I do not refer to this in any offensive sense whatever, but simply to show that the difficulties which surround our financial system are attributable to other causes than such as have originated from mere political antagonisms. I attribute the present depreciated condition of our currency to other and to different causes than those which some of the distinguished gentlemen who have discussed this question have submitted. One of these causes I insist is that the Government has ignored its true measure of responsibility by failing to recognize the fact that the paper promises-to-pay which it has issued is a valid, subsisting debt, long since overdue and long since dishonored and depresisting debt, and the side of th ciated; and, instead of adopting measures looking to the payment of these overdue obligations, it has treated them as being payable only at its convenience, and has bent all its energies to looking after the payment of its interest-bearing debt, the payment of which might wisely be deferred until crippled industries have been revived by a restoration to the people of a sound currency with which to conduct their business enterprises. To show how the people of other countries look upon this mistaken policy, I desire to call attention to an able and claborate article, credited to the Westminster Review, upon "Foreign Loans and National Debts." After expressing the opinion that we are trying to pay off our immense war debt too fast, and that in order to accomplish that purpose we have adopted such severe taxation and such a mistaken system of imports that we have crippled many branches of American industry, the writer adds:

many branches of American industry, the writer adds:

It is strange to find that this people, so proud of its position among the nations, and so anxious to relieve itself from debt and everything that the condition of debt implies, should suffer themselves to be reproached with the existence among them of a paper currency ten years after the close of the civil war.

A bank note or a treasury note is but a promise to pay a certain amount of coin on demand, and in any well-ordered system of finance there should be practically sufficient soin or bullion to meet these promises. To our mind, there is no valid excuse for allowing the national promises to pay to be at a discount aday longer than is absolutely necessary. The only possible gain to a nation—and it is only a material one—is the annual interest saved on the bullion, which is dispensed with by the overissue; but against this is to be set the moral element of uncertainty, and almost of gambling, which is imparted into every monetary transaction, the manipulations of gold-rings, and all the evils which spring from artificiality. We consider it a reproach, therefore, to our transatlantic cousins that ten years after the close of their civil war their promises to pay on demand can be bought at 13 per cent. discount: Poverty cannot, as in the case of some other nations, be pleaded in excuse. As we have seen, £118,000,000 have been paid off in ten years, and every effort is being made to reduce still further the interest bearing portion. We think that they look too much in this direction, to the detriment of what should be done in the other. If any nation is justified in looking into the future, and discounting it, it is the people of the United States. Its wealth and population increase in a ratio more rapid than that of any other nation. At the present moment it has within its borders a population of 44,000,000, and an annual income of £1,100,000,000, and in the course of half a century it will number a hundred millions of inhabitants, with an annual production

In consideration of a depreciated currency, and because of the stagnation existing in business and the crippled industries of the country, which have resulted from this condition, it would seem most wise that the Government should, to the greatest extent possible consistent with the national honor and credit abroad, defer the payment of our interest-bearing debt until our currency shall be so appreciated in value that we can with a dollar of it pay a dollar of our debt in any part of the commercial world. This, it seems to me, would be the part of prudence and common honesty, and is the course which every private individual would be compelled to pursue in relation to his private business. Indeed any other course than this would not be tolerated in the citizen, and I do not see that there is any other rule for the Government in regard to the payment of its debts than that which is insisted upon in all the business affairs of private life.

Another one of the causes which have operated to fluctuate values and to bring financial distress has been the uncertainty which has existed in the minds of the people as to what would be the action of the Government in relation to the volume of the currency. They have heard threatenings of inflation at one time and of contraction at another time. Their confidence in a certain uniform policy by the Government in relation to the volume of currency to be put afloat or kept in circulation has been shaken. Financiers have been restrained from investing their money in enterprises which might ruin them if any decided change in values should take place. Money has sought accumulations in speculations, fair and foul, only so results would be speedy. Gold gamblers, and watered-stock speculators, and curbstone brokers have plied their vocations at the money centers in the great cities while the productive enterprises and business interests of the country have been languishing for want of sustenance, while manufacturing establishments have been hushed into quiet and honest labor has remained unemployed.

This unfortunate condition of things is the natural fruit of an uncertain policy by the Government in relation to the volume of a currency which the exigencies of war threw upon us and upon which the entire business of the country has been based. It is the unquestionable result which will always obtain where there is nothing to regulate either the volume or quality of a money with which the people are compelled to do business except the treacherous sea of legislative faith; and in my humble opinion that full and firm confidence so absolutely essential to a successful and prosperous business will never be fully restored until it is distinctly and finally settled that it is contrary to the policy of the Government in the exercise of its constitutional functions to issue paper money in times of peace.

While I hold, therefore, that the Government should not be permitted to issue a dollar in paper money under any circumstances and while I am fully persuaded that the issue already made under the exercise of a war power was impolitic and unwise, yet, inasmuch as it did issue it and inasmuch as about $400,000,000 of it are actually afloat Government toward the people require that we do not attempt to increase its quality through a forcible contraction of its quantity by congressional enactment. While the Government has the undoubted right to do this, yet, as the business of the country has been established with full knowledge of the fact that a given amount of currency was in circulation, it does not seem to me to be fair to attempt to affect its values by reducing its values. What the government has the undoubted right to do this, yet, as the business of the country has been established with full knowledge of the fact that a given amount of currency was in circulation, it does not seem to me to be fair to attempt to affect its value by reducing its values. What the government is value by reducing its values. tempt to affect its value by reducing its volume. What does good faith require? Simply this, that the Government begin to save the faith require? Simply this, that the Government begin to save the money committed to its keeping from all unwarrantable expenditures and lay away something day by day and month by month with which to pay this debt, with which to redeem this currency; let these savings be in that article which constitutes the money of the world; let it recognize the simple fact that the way to pay a debt is to accumulate the money with which to pay it; that the way to resume is to get ready to resume. Let it adopt some reasonable but fixed and settled policy which, if fairly and honestly carried out, will certainly result in bringing its issue of currency to par and to a resumption of specie payments, and then let it work with the people for those politic and economic conditions which shall bring prosperity to business, which will build up shattered industries, which will quicken the commerce and trade of the country, which will furnish remunerative employment for labor, and which shall re-establish commercial honor and financial integrity.

Another and a still greater reason than any of the others which I have mentioned, why we have a depreciated currency, why business lies prostrate, and why honest industry is deadened, is because of the unwarrantable, unjustifiable, profligate, and criminal extravagance unwarrantable, unjustifiable, profligate, and criminal extravagance which has grown up in this country, and which has for so many years been tolerated, yea more, cultivated, in every department of the Government. Why, sir, look at the facts; the developments thus far made during this session of Congress show that, without detriment to the public service and without indulging in any niggardly or parsimonious schemes, the current expenses of this Government for the next year can be reduced the enormous sum of at least $30,000,000. If so much can be done in one year in the way of retrenchment and reform by measures emanating from this branch of Congress, a large majority of whose members are new to public life and utterly unaccustomed to the intricacies of legislation and the details of governmental affairs, how much more could have been done, and should have been done, in the same direction during the years that have elapsed since the war closed and peace began to shine upon the country, by those who from long experience had a full and perfect knowledge of all the details of governmental administration. It is safe to assume that during all these twelve years the expenses of the Government could have been reduced below what they actually were at least $45,000,000 annually, which would have in the time aggregated the enormous sum of $540,000,000, nearly $150,000,000 more than the amount necessary to redeem the entire greenback currency of this country, and this, too, without calculating the increase which might have been accumulated from it by its proper use during the time. What excuse can be made by the Government to the people, whose servant it is, for such reprehensible extravagance and execrable stewardship?

We have all read the story of a man who before starting upon a journey to a far country called his servants together and confided to their separate keeping certain sums of money, and upon his return he again called them before him to ascertain what use they had made of it, to get an account of their stewardship and to reward them according to their just deserts. All except one had bought and sold and made increase of the money, and were commended by their master as servants who having been faithful over a few things were entitled to be made rulers over many things. But one had not been a faithful servant. True he had not stolen his master's money nor squandered it, for he had the same identical piece of money and returned it to its owner saying: "Lo, there thou hast that is thine." Yet he had neglected to put it to any proper use, and for this simple neglect of duty, not involving any moral turpitude, he was deprived of all rulership and punished by being cast into outer darkness. If this severe punishment was deemed to be due for a mere neglect of a reasonable duty, how much more severe ought the punishment of that servant to be who has not only neglected to profitably use the money confided to its keeping by a brave and generous people, but has also recklessly and extravagantly squandered the money itself, so that it cannot be returned to the owners who have the right to demand it.

A large number of new offices have been created, and a large number of unnecessary old ones have been maintained; these have been filled with a like number of office-holders with large salaries and perquisites attached, all of which have had to be paid from the public Treasury. Like leeches they have been fastened upon the body-politic, and from year to year they have been growing fat and rich by sucking the life-blood from all the industries of an overtaxed people. They have been eliminated from the great body of producers who are the creators of wealth. They produce nothing; they absorb everything. They toil not, neither do they spin; and yet they have by the use of the people's money been assisted to array themselves like the lilies of the field.

An army of useless office-holders has been permitted to be clothed An army of useless office-holders has been permitted to be clothed in purple and fine linen and to fare sumptuously every day, while a still greater army of God's deserving poor, who have been compelled to contribute to the furnishing of these very luxuries, liave, with sorrow in their hearts, with tears upon their cheeks, and with prayers upon their tongues, been entreating for labor, to the end that they might get bread for their wives and little ones. The specious argument that the honor of the Government can only be maintained by an exhibition of glitter and extravagant luxuriance only permissible in a monarchical government, if anywhere, has been made the occasion for high salaries in order to get money with which to keen up the for high salaries, in order to get money with which to keep up the show of splendor; the same argument, still further pursued, has led to fraud and peculation and crime; the public service has become cor-rupted; and as act after act of official malfeasance is exposed to the gaze of the world, the American people are compelled to bow their heads in sorrow and in shame over the disgrace brought upon them and the country. Now, sir, if we expect honesty and economy in the administration Now, sir, if we expect honesty and economy in the administration of the Government we must not tolerate this sentiment. We must recognize the fact that republican simplicity is most becoming to a republican government; that honesty and ability and adaptability to the discharge of the duties imposed are of the most vital importance in the selection of a public official; that the quality of the clothes he wears or the style of his equipage or the magnificence of his hospitality are only of secondary importance. We should evolve from the Capitol of this great nation the idea that it is not all of life to hold an office, no matter how exalted. We should publish to the world that we are not ashamed to own that we are the representaworld that we are not ashamed to own that we are the representatives of a laboring people, nor ashamed to acknowledge the fact that labor is respectable, no matter how sooty or how laborious, only so it is honest. As the wealth and prosperity of the country can only be created or assured by the productions which labor brings into being, we should remember that the humblest man who is honestly laboring for his living and who is by the sweat of his brow contributing toward the advancement of our great agricultural, manufacturing, and ma-terial interests is doing more to elevate us from our depressed financial condition than the soft-handed aristocrat who looks down upon We should also remember that he is more entitled to our respectful consideration and protection, that he is more nearly a king in all that pertains to the development of our natural and artificial resources than that other one who, forgetting that in this free Republic every man is the arbiter of his own fortunes and that those are most honorable who fight the battles of life most nobly, stands idly by with no occupation except that of priding himself upon his inherited wealth or his supposed social position. We should stop all the avenues of extravagance which lead to luxury, no matter how much we may be tempted to do otherwise. I do not believe that the true grandeur of a country consists so much in its palaces or the pomp and show of its splendor as it does in the prosperity and happiness of its people. Palaces may crumble and the most gorgeous edifices erected by man may fall to the ground, but the impress which an intelligent, enterprising, and prosperous people put upon the age in which they by man may fait to the ground, but the impress which an intelligent, enterprising, and prosperous people put upon the age in which they live becomes a history nobler and more imperishable than can be made with brass or marble or granite. Italy is filled with palaces, and yet an impoverished people beg for bread under their shadows. Greece is famed for her relics of grand architectural beauty, yet her fields are waste and her prosperity gone. So we, by forgetting the simplicity which characterized the founders of the Government and plunging into foolish and unrepublican extravagances, may absorb plunging into foolish and unrepublican extravagances, may absorb the money needed by an already overtaxed and overburdened people, and pile it up in structures which may in after years stand to mock the beggary of a people whose glory has departed.

Mr. Chairman, to summarize the questions which the consideration of this important subject presents, I maintain that we should recog-nize that standard of money which is recognized by the commercial nations of the world with which we deal and that, by the adoption under safe limitations and restrictions of some system of free banking, we should remit to the people, who are the creators and lawful owners of all the wealth we have, the right to issue and keep in circulation such a volume of currency as they in their wisdom may deem necessary to satisfy the demands of commerce and trade, only require ing them to keep it redeemable at the pleasure of the holder in the money which it purports to represent; that we should assert the doctrine that the Government as such has no right to put in circulation anything but coin money; that we should not attempt by congressional enactments to increase the quality of the currency already afloat by the forcible contraction of its volume except by making provision for its payment and redemption, and beyond this we should leave the question of contraction solely to the determination of the laws of trade; that we should adopt immediate measures to improve the quality and appreciate the value of our currency by making provision for its payment and redemption at as early a day as is consonant with the business interests of the country, and in order that we may be able to accomplish this desirable result most speedily, that we should shut off all unnecessary expenditures in every department of the Government, and insist upon republican simplicity and economy in every branch of the public service; that we should protect the people from robbery of all kinds by preventing irregularities and stealing, and by setting the seal of condemnation upon any and every man guilty of infamous practices in public affairs; that, instead of man guilty of infamous practices in public affairs; that, instead of indulging in criminations and recriminations tending to incite sectional animosities between the North and the South, the East and the West, we should set to work, earnestly, determinedly, patriotically, to solve those problems of political economy which shall tend to furnish cheap transportation for the varied productions of the people of all sections of the country, which shall tend to settle values, which shall restore confidence, which shall revive commerce and trade, which shall magnify our manufacturing interests, which shall furnish remurerative employment for the industrious toilers and which shall set nerative employment for the industrious toilers, and which shall set the warm blood of prosperity coursing through every artery of the body of American trade and commerce

Instead of pointing to the picture of a dreadful past, over which it is better that the mantle of oblivion should fall, let us put ourselves in resolute opposition against all that class of unjust legislation which subsidizes great corporations, which fosters monopolies, and which leads to extravagance and corruption in the public service.

Now, sir, recognizing the fact that all the measures which seem to be necessary to aid in re-establishing financial prosperity cannot in a body composed of such varied interests as this be made to conform to all the ideas of any one man, be he humble or be he great, I shall take pleasure in voting for any measure which shall tend, in however small a degree, to bring our currency to a specie basis.

Believing that this bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government now under consideration, and which if all its provisions are adopted provides for a reduction of $11,000,000 over the expenditures of last year, and which, therefore, places at the disposal of the Government just that amount of money to be used in appreciating the currency, is such a bill, I hope it will receive the cordial and unanimous approval of every member of this House

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as all of the gentlemen who have yet spoken upon the bill nominally under consideration in this Committee of the Whole have discussed every subject except what is contained within the bill, I am not sure that I will be exactly in order if I should speak to the merits or demerits of it. I will, however, take that risk, and will endeavor to examine somewhat into the nature and character of the various items of the bill under consideration. When I first took it up and looked over it, I noticed that it appropriated $5,000,000 less than was appropriated by

Mr. TOWNSEND. Six millions less than the bill of last year. I noticed, also, that it appropriates $7,000,000 less than what has been asked for by the different Departments of the Government. I therefore queried to myself what are the principles upon which the committee has endeavored to frame it? I took up the report of the committee, and in conjunction with it I examined the bill from beginning At last I think I have found out the principle that has guided the committee in making it out. After exploring it from one end to the other, it seemed to me that the committee had acted upon the

to the other, it seemed to me that the committee had acted upon the principle of the belligerent Irishman of Donnybrook fair, which principle was: "Whenever you see a head, hit it."

The committee have gone through the different Departments of the Government; they have gone into the War Department, the Treasury Department, the Navy Department; they have gone everywhere where an official could be found; and wherever they saw the head of a poor clerk, or an auditor, or a comptroller, or an assistant secretary, they hit him, and in some cases they hit him very hard. The reduction made by them in some classes of cases amounts to 7 per cent. tion made by them in some classes of cases amounts to 7 per cent., in others to 10 per cent., in others to 11 per cent., and in some as high as 20 per cent.; and these reductions seem to have been made without regard to any particular principle except that of the reduction of out regard to any particular principle except that of the reduction of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to make a remark?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. My friend will have all the time between now and the termination of this session of Congress to answer me.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will only say that at the proper time I will correct the misstatement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I do not want to be interrupted. I do not interrupt others. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will have all the time during the discussion of this bill to explain the principle upon which it is based.

I repeat that the Committee on Appropriations have made these realizations without regard to a great many things that they should reductions without regard to a great many things that they should have taken into consideration. They have done it without regard to qualifications. They have taken up series and classes of clerks and reduced their salaries; no matter whether the clerk was a good clerk or a bad one, they have cut down his pay. It seems to have made no difference to the committee whether the clerk was a man who had been appointed a month ago or years ago; whether he was raw and inefficient in his office, or was a man who had grown gray in the service of the nation—who had given his time, his talents, his abilities to the service of the country. They were all reduced in their salaries. The committee seem to have had no respect to the fact that the cost of living to the clerks and to the officers of the Government here is far more now than it used to be when their salaries were established; that it takes more for them to support their families, to provide them with food and raiment, than it did in former times, perhaps at the time when they were appointed.

They did not take into consideration another circumstance which is important in the discussion and consideration of this bill; that we are now on an upward movement, that we are moving on the incoming wave of a renewed prosperity. We have touched the bottom of our disasters, and we are now emerging from the tricls and troubles imposed upon us by an inflated currency and an unfortunate system of finance, the resulting incidents of the late rebellion. I repeat that we are emerging from that unfortunate condition, and our furnaces, forges, and manufactories are opening their doors and setting their machinery again in motion; at least I know that is so in the district

I have the honor to represent.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to a very few particulars and classes of cases embraced in this bill, which will show that the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations have cut down, mercilessly cut down in some cases, the compensation of some of the very best officers of the Government. Take for instance the Clerk of the House, an officer whose position is next in importance to that of the Speaker. On some occasions he is as important as the Speaker himself. It is his duty at the opening of Congress to organize the House. In the case of a disputed election, in the midst of excited political feeling, it may happen that a single vote one way or the other may give to one party or the other the majority, and consequently the power of the House, hence he should be a man of the utmost integrity to enable him to act fairly between the contending parties. We must remember that he is an individual who has great power and great privileges, and that he ought to be paid accordingly. But they have reduced his compensation 10 per cent.

So, too, with the Chief Clerk, whose compensation they have cut down to $2,250, taking off $1,350 from his salary. They have reduced it nearly 40 per cent. Now the Chief Clerk of this House is an officer of the greatest importance. He has charge of all the work; he has the care of everything almost in the making up of the legislation of Clerk of the House, an officer whose position is next in importance to the care of everything almost in the making up of the legislation of the House. It is right and proper that a man having such arduous duties to perform should be honestly, justly, and properly recom-

We come next in the bill to the reporters of debates of the House, the gentlemen who sit before us and take down our debates and the proceedings here every day. They, too, are men upon whose faithfulness and ability to report accurately the speeches that are made here the reputation, perchance, of many members may depend. If they be dishonest in reporting, if they be inaccurate, if they render a report that is incorrect, they may place in the wrong attitude before his constituents a member of this House, and perhaps may destroy his political standing altogether. It is right and proper then that you should have men of the highest class wen of intervity, whilty, and learning have men of the highest class, men of integrity, ability, and learning to take down the reports of the speeches as they may occur here. But the committee have reduced these gentlemen 10 per cent. also. So, too, with the Librarian of Congress. I do not know that there is a gentleman within the walls of this building who is more useful to members of Congress than this officer. He is a walking encyclopedia. There is no branch of learning upon which you may apply to him in which you will not find him a ready man. When you want him in which you will not find him a ready man. When you want to ascertain any fact in history, in literature, in politics, or on any other branch of knowledge, if you inquire of any one who sits beside you where you can find it, the answer always is, if your friend does not happen to know it himself, "Go and ask Spofford." An officer of this kind, so highly cultivated, knowing languages other than his own, being familiar with the 300,000 volumes in the Congressional Library, deserves to have a full and a liberal compensation. Yet our friends upon the committee have cut him down severely also.

There is another officer of the Government who is probably equally important in another line; I mean the Comptroller of the Currency. He is one who has charge of the twenty-one hundred banks of the nation. It is he who under the law guides and directs them. It is he to whom they all apply, if they have any want of knowledge, concerning the interpretation of any of the acts of Congress in relation to the banks. He terpretation of any of the acts of Congress in relation to the banks. He who gets together all the reports of the banks and tabulates them; and, in addition to that, gives us fuller information than we can get anywhere else as to the workings of the currency system of the nation. He must necessarily be a man not only of information, but of integrity; because if he be not capable and honest, the whole financial system of the country, so far as it relates to the soundness of the condition of the banks, may go into disorder by his omission to keep the banks up to their work or by his collusion with bank examiners who may be corrupt, and certify to the soundness of rotten institutions.

may be corrupt, and certify to the soundness of rotten institutions.

Coming down a little further in the bill, I find that they have reduced the chief of the Bureau of Statistics from $2,500 to $2,250. Now here is another gentleman within the Treasury Department to whom we are all greatly indebted. We are under obligations to him for the accuracy of his statistics. He it is who tabulates all the custom-house returns, who gives us all the knowledge that we get with regard to our foreign and our internal commerce. benever we are discussing tariffs and matters of that kind, and need information that may be available for such a discussion. In addition to that, I may say that he has earned the gratitude not only of the House, but of the country, for the excellent work which he has just issued from his Bureau, entitled "Labor in Europe and America," a work which affords us a better idea than we ever had before of the industrial institutions of the Old and of the New World; which gives us an opportunity of comparing our own industrial system with those of foreign lands. I think it was hard, I think it was sharp to reduce his foreign lands.

little salary 10 per cent., bringing it down to $2,250.

But again, in that same Treasury Department is an officer who is intimately connected with the history of the currency of the country, not only so far as regards bank-notes and legal-tenders, but also in connection with the bonded indebtedness of the nation. I allude to the chief of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. It is right and proper that we should obtain for an office of that responsible kind the very best talent in the land; that we should have in that position a man of high character, good information, great executive ability, keen and sharp at accounts, because there pass through his hands every year hundreds of millions of dollars in the shape of one kind of currency or another and of the national bonds emanating from the Treasury. Yet the Committee on Appropriations have degraded his high office from $5,000 a year to $4,500, with little regard for the highly responsible position that he holds and the large amount of security that Going still further into the list of the reductions which have been Going still further into the list of the reductions which have been made by the Committee on Appropriations, I turn to the Post-Office Department. I find there three Assistant Postmasters-General, having charge of the whole postal interests of the country; having under their care 36,000 offices, with mail-routes extending in every direction all over the nation; charged with the examination of all the contracts for carrying the mails, with the appointment and supervision of 50,000 officers, and charged with interests that amount to some thirty or thirty-five million dollars a year. These gentlemen, some of them members of Congress in former times, men of high integrity and great business qualifications, are reduced 10 per cent, their inand great business qualifications, are reduced 10 per cent., their in-adequate salaries being brought down to $3,150.

I now turn to the Department of the Interior. I want to speak particularly with regard to the reduction in the General Land Office. That Office requires an intimate knowledge of the land laws and the history of the public lands of the country. The man at the head of that Bureau should be well versed in law—not only the land law of that Bureau should be well versed in law—not only the land law of the nation but in the decisions of the Supreme Court with regard to it. He should be a man whose eye will extend all over the land States and Territories, and who can ferret out frauds and corruptions wherever they may exist. It is within my knowledge that a first-class Commissioner of the Land Office was actually driven out of that Office because of the inadequacy of the salary allowed him. The salary having been previously I believe $4,000, was reduced to $3,000. satary having been previously 1 believe $4,000, was reduced to $3,000. Congress would not increase it; and he was actually forced to resign because he was not allowed sufficient money to support himself and his family. And there is within my knowledge the additional fact that that Commissioner of the Land Office by his vigilance detected certain frauds against the Government, and thereby saved to it in a single transaction sufficient to have paid the increase of his salary ten times over. That efficient officer was thus forced out to make his ten times over. That efficient officer was thus forced out to make his living wherever he could in the practice of his profession. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the right kind of economy that should actuate a nation that desires to be well served and by competent

This policy is pursued still further in the Pension Office. tleman who has charge of that Office was brought here in the expectation that he would receive $3,000 a year. He is a person well versed in the law; a gentleman high in esteem in his own State of Wisconsin. He was elevated there, if I remember aright, to the office of attorney-general of the State. This man of great ability and integrity our Government has invited here to take charge of the Pension Office, distributing annually $30,000,000 in pensions; and after he has been here but a month or two, reduce his salary 10 per cent., and I consider that it is not treating him with instance. that is not treating him with justice.

But when we come still further into this bill we find another on-slaught made upon another excellent institution, the Bureau of Educa-tion. We find the committee have cut its appropriation down from $35,570 last year to $16,100. They have reduced the compensation of the enlightened and educated Commissioner from $3,000 to $2,700; they have reduced the number of officers from thirteen to eleven. They have allowed perhaps a sufficient force of officers, but at the same time they have given them nothing to do. They have given $14,890 of salary to be divided among eleven gentlemen, from the Commissioner down, and they have only given them $1,210 to work upon. I am desirous of hoping this is an error in the Committee on Appropriations, for I cannot conceive that gentlemen of intelligence would provide for the existence of a bureau, and for its working, and give it nothing at all wherewith to execute its duties and to promote the objects of its establishment.

Last year they gave it for stationery alone $2,000; for library-cases, $500; for library, $1,000; for collecting statistics and writing and compiling matter for annual and special reports, editing and publishing circulars of information, $11,000; and for contingencies,

$1,060; making, with other items, $17,210, wherewith they might pursue the operations of the Bureau. But to-day, instead of giving the officers as much money to do the work as they had last year, they do not give them sufficient even for their stationery. They do not allow them stationery enough to use at their desks to write out their answers to correspondents, let alone to make out their reports. They do not give them a dollar wherewith they can collect information necessary to compile the magnificent volume which they publish every year, giving to this country and to the world the largest and most complete amount of knowledge of the condition of the educational system of our land.

It reminds me, Mr. Chairman, when they give them all this machinery and nothing to work it with, of the evil time the children of Israel had under Pharaoh. Their case is marvelously similar, for Pharaoh said to the Children of Israel:

Go therefore now, and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks.

And the officers of the children of Israel did see that they were in evil case, after it was said, Ye shall not minish aught from your bricks of your daily task.

And the officers of this Bureau begin to see they, too, are in evil case when they are set a task to perform and given no money wherewith to perform it.

I say, therefore, the Committee on Appropriations must assuredly have made a mistake, and I appeal to that committee, to their sense of justice and of right, (and I know they are gentlemen of education and culture,) to the instincts within them, to give to this Bureau that provision which will enable it to get together the statistics so interesting to this country, and so much sought after by educators here and in other lands.

and in other lands.

Coming still further down the bill I find, in one of their last sections, that they reduce the salaries of all the clerks in all the Departments. In section 2 they take up the second and third-class clerks, and the fourth-class clerks as well. They strike at them all, no matter how small the salary may be. Fourteen-hundred-dollar clerks are reduced to $1,300, being over 7 per cent. reduction; sixteen-hundred-dollar clerks to $1,450, being between 9 and 10 per cent.; and eighteen-hundred-dollar clerks to $1,600, being over 10 per cent. reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. The average is under 10 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The average, my friend from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, says, is under 10 per cent., and I accept his statement.

I wish to say a word respecting the clerks of these Departments. I have been here for seven years; have had daily intercourse with them in one Department or another from one end of the Government here to the other during the sessions of Congress; and on every occa-

here to the other during the sessions of Congress; and on every occasion wherever I asked for information or required a duty to be done I have found them civil, obliging, and well-informed. I protest most earnestly against this reduction of that useful class of the employés of the Government. I protest against it because they are the least paid men in the Departments, save the first-class clerks at $1,200 and the nine-hundred-dollar clerks. Some have been here for years. They have grown gray in the service. Their salaries were fixed when the cost of living was much cheaper than now. They have continued from day to day, from month to month, from year to year, discharging the duties of their offices fully and faithfully and becoming more the duties of their offices fully and faithfully and becoming more valuable as time has rolled on. They have raised families around them, and as those families have increased their expenses have grown, without any corresponding increase in their salaries. I say, therefore, that their case appeals not only to the humanity but to the justice of every individual member. With salaries reduced in this way, clerks who have been here for years, having families growing up around them, can hardly make both ends meet at the close of the year. The fact is that on numerous occasions some of them have come to me and said "Cannot you get me promoted from the position."

year. The fact is that on numerous occasions some of them have come to me and said, "Cannot you get me promoted from the position I am in to the next higher one, for I am to-day actually muable to meet my expenses? I am running in debt, and unless I can be relieved by promotion and higher pay I must eventually sink under it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be some regard to the expenses of living. There should be some respect paid to the length of service. There should be some consideration for the qualification of officers. And yet the Committee on Appropriations have not had the slightest regard to any one of these matters. No matter how well qualified, how love they have been in service, or what may be the expense of living. long they have been in service, or what may be the expense of living, 10 per cent. must be taken off, shaved off from the poor compensation

And respecting the whole of this curtailment of expenditure, I want to remark that it is not called for by the emergencies of the Government. It is not demanded by the situation of the nation. We are paying off our debt; we are reducing the interest; we are changing the debt from one rate of interest to another and saving expenditure thereby. thereby. Nay, more, the industry of the country is beginning to revive; it is springing up in every quarter, and the argument which would have been good some years ago is no argument now.

It was right and proper the committee thought, no doubt, that when they cut down everybody else they should cut down their own compensation too. And here I come to the compensation of ourselves; a delicate matter some times to talk about, but one which I shall talk about without any hesitation at all. I am opposed to this reduction; I am utterly and absolutely opposed to any reduction in the wages of Congressmen. If the wages of Congressmen in former times were a great deal less than they are now, it was because the rate of living was a great deal less. And it may be a little curious for you to know what was the rate of living in Washington about three-quarters of a century ago. In turning over the papers of one of my predecessors, who was an old revolutionary colonel, I found a letter dated December, 1800, which gives a curious view of the condition of congressional life at that time. Writing home to a son he says:

I am now settled in a Large double House near the Capitol, and in a Room with Kittora from Lancaster—a Sociable pleasant man and seems Agreeable—where I bope to remain comfortably for the winter. Our only fear is the want of Fire Wood—no Stock yet laid in, but we keep persecuting our Landlord to get a Quantity—& he says he Bargained for 20 Cords this week, but none comes yet.

It seems they were pretty hard up for fuel then, as coal had not been discovered.

We have about 14 Boarders at 10 Dolls. p. week.

You see board was a good deal lower than it is now, when it is from $120 to $200 per month, lodging included:

Irom $120 to $200 per month, lodging included:

And a Large family of Workmen and servants—about 12 fires burning constantly when we have Wood—sometimes half Starving, & obliged to troop down to the Dining-Room for warmth. We have some high Fliers at Table, viz: Gonverneur Morris of New York—a pleasant Witty Man of knowledge of the world, formerly Ambassador to France, &c.—Mr. Dayton of Jersey, our Old Speaker—a General Morris of Vermont—who keep the Table in a Roar of laughter mostly at Dinner. We don't Drink hard, but sometimes rather more than I wish—nothing but Wine in Our Club. About half the Company wont touch, but take Brandy & Water, & Run off as soon as they have done Eating. These are Democrats—about half the company, Leaving 7 or 8 of us the Table to ourselves.

I read that ancient letter for a double purpose-to show how cheap

I read that ancient letter for a double purpose—to show how cheap congressional living was then—

Mr. HOAR. And to show the consistency of the democrats.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes; only that they have changed from brandy and water to good rye whisky.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to our own salaries, I do not think that they are any too high. I do not think, perhaps, that they are high enough; and I have most excellent authority for that. I have the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Some two or three years ago we had a controversy about that matter and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made a most excellent speech in favor of $7.500. He was very anxious then that excellent speech in favor of $7,500. He was very anxious then that that should be the figure; and as his speech is a very good one upon that point, I will ask the Clerk to read that part of it which I have marked with pencil.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Randall. When I went into this conference on this bill I found that there were three overshadowing questions beyond all others which were in controversy between the two Houses. The first one that met us in committee was this question of salaries. Upon that question I have uttered no doubtful sound and have made no doubtful record in this House. I have declared to the country and to my constituents that I believed I have earned $7,500 a year since I have been in this Congress, and that I could not live here for less with my family with any sort of decency. I do not know how it may be with members from the rural districts, to which my friend from Indiana [Mr. Niblack] has referred, but I could not go into a conference and suggest that there should be any difference in this respect between rural members and those who come from cities.

There is another consideration upon this question of salaries; almost all members of Congress are compelled, like myself, to keep up a residence here, while at the same time retaining their residences within the State from which they come.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Farnsworth] has talked about the "manhood" of this report. Why, sir, I would like to ask him whether it is not more manly to stand here and vote deliberately in the face of the whole country for this increase shan it is for a member to raise his voice in a demagogical strain against such a proposition, and then, as soon as the law takes effect, to go and draw the money from the Treasury? Any man here who raises his voice against this increase should not, in my judgment, take the money if the measure passes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Now the gentleman from

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Now the gentleman from Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, an excellent gentleman I know, and whom I esteem and admire, has given his idea of what was the value of a Congressman's services three years ago. He was honest then, I have no doubt. I trust that he is equally honest now. He has depreciated, however—and he is the best judge of the value of his own services—he has depreciated from $7,500 a year, which he voted for and took then, down to $4,500—a depreciation of $3,000 or about 40 per cent., the largest money depreciation that I ever knew in reference to the services of a member of Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if he was worth $7,500 then, some of the rest of us who are not so talented, who are not so gifted or experienced.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if he was worth $7,500 then, some of the rest of us who are not so talented, who are not so gifted or experienced, ought to be worth at least $5,000 a year. We think we are. I think I am. My constituents think I am or they would not have sent me here. I tell you in regard to that, that my constituency would not send me here for any sum under $5,000 a year. I am instructed as to that. I cannot vote for less than I am by law now entitled to.

Sir, during my first canvass for Congress seven years ago I stumped my district with my political opponent. He was a middle-aged democrat, a lawyer, well informed, cloquent, and economical. He ran upon the same line which the Committee on Appropriations is running on to-day. We called it then "the economy dodge;" I do not know what it is called now. We stumped my district together, spoke from the same platforms to the same audiences at the same meetings, and we had a good time generally. He appealed to the people that the Government was too extravagant, that it paid now $5,000 a year to Congressmen, whereas in the olden times when Henry Clay and Daniel Webster and Calhoun and others of like ability were here the pay was only $8 a day; and on the stump at every meeting he made a propoonly $8 a day; and on the stump at every meeting he made a proposition to the people that if they would send him to Congress he would come for the eld pay of $8 a day, find his own roast-beef and potatoes, and give the balance over and above that to the treasuries of the counties of the district. I opposed him on that ground, among others, and said to my constituents that I would not come here for anything less than what the law allowed, and they sent me here by a triumphless than what the law allowed, and they sent me here by a triumphant majority; and whenever this question of pay of Congressmen has come up heretofore I have voted for the full $5,000 a year or its equivalent, and my constituency have ratified my action and returned me repeatedly. I therefore want to say to gentlemen that your constituents are not niggardly. They want you to be well paid, and when they come here to see you, on business or pleasure, they do not desire to find you eating your dinner in a kitchen and sleeping in a garret, but expect to find you in good, comfortable quarters, where you can transact your business and carry on your correspondence with a proper degree of convenience and comfort. They want you to be well paid degree of convenience and comfort. They want you to be well paid, honestly, fairly, fully paid, because they know, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] knows, because he said it in his speech, that a man with a family cannot come here and live on less than $5,000, and he thought at that time that $7,500 was the necessary amount.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this matter of compensation the people are fully informed. They know very well that no man can live here with his family on less than $5,000 a year. When the average Congressman first leaves home and his fond wife sees him going to Congressman first leaves home and his fond wife sees him going to the station with his carpet-bag in his hand, she says in the simplicity of her loving heart, "There goes the making of a great statesman." [Langhter.] But when he reaches the capital there is another woman, the boarding-house keeper, who is lying in wait for him and entertains a different opinion of him. She is smart and wary and puts him through a cross-examination to ascertain whether or not he is really a member of Congress, and if he is a little verdant and slightly elated with his position he is apt to disclose himself, and then she says to herself "Here is a fat goos to be pulpeted and L will place slightly elated with his position he is apt to disclose himself, and then she says to herself, "Here is a fat goose to be plucked and I will pluck him." [Langhter.] And I think they generally pluck him accordingly. Why, sir, I have been asked at boarding-houses in this city as high as $20 per day for myself, my wife, and two children, being more than the pay allowed me. No man can come to this city and have a respectable living for less than at the rate of $5,000 a year; and, sir, I trust that there will be no want of nerve in respect to this matter. I trust gentlemen will have the courage to come up to the work and do themselves justice, as well as justice to the clerks so unmercifully cut down by this bill. cut down by this bill.

Now the principle of the bill is all wrong; in fact, there is no principle about it; the only principle, if it can be so called, is to cut down 10 per cent. wherever you can, however much the cutting down may injure the public service of the country. I do not intend to say, sir, that the members of the Committee on Appropriations have made all these reductions merely for buncombe or to go before the people for electioneering purposes as great economists, because I wish to give full faith and credit to the honest intent of the committee, but I do say that there is no principle here worth considering.

The true principle upon which this bill should be based is, first, to go through the Departments and see if there be any unnecessary clerks there, and wherever any are found to dismiss them; and then to pay those who remain full compensation for their services. Pay them well, and if they do not do duty enough, give them work for another hour each day, and if that is not sufficient, add another hour to that. Make them work eight hours a day. I work here in Congress frequently sixteen hours a day, and so do the rest of us. They can well afford to work eight hours a day, and you can thus be relieved from some of your clerks who may be incompetent. But as regards those whom you do employ, pay them sufficient to enable them to live properly and support their families and to educate their children.

properly and support their families and to educate their children.

But there is another way whereby the economies of the country may be promoted; whereby in this appropriation bill as in other appropriation bills much may be saved to the Government. A portion of it has been saved already. In the fortification appropriation bill a million of dollars was saved, a million of dollars that had before been appropriated for what would now be useless and unnecessary expenditures. Cease the building of new custom-houses and post-offices unless they be absolutely necessary. Stop the building of new ships of war and new forts and the establishment of new arsenals and magazines if they are not needed. Stop building new courthouses all over the country. Cut off new appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors where they are not yet absolutely necessary, or where commerce can be carried on as well as it has been necessary, or where commerce can be carried on as well as it has been heretofore, and let those improvements wait for "the good time coming," when we may be entirely out of debt, or so far out of debt that it will be manageable and within our control.

Keep up all necessary repairs. I would not diminish the appropriations for repairs a single dollar. Keep the Government in full working order; keep everything going that is necessary to be kept moving. But encourage no useless expenditures; cut off all of those. I ask in the name of humanity, in the name of justice, in the name of all that is good and right in legislation, that this indiscriminate and wholesale slaughter of the salaries of the employés of the Government, especially of the lower classes of clerks already named, shall not be ratified by an American Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] agreed to yield to me the remainder of his hour after concluding his remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman gave up the floor, and the Chair recognized me.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I have not given up the floor. Mr. RANDALL. I will take but a few minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] can take the floor afterward.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I want to say that I promised my friend from Iowa that at the close of my remarks I would yield

The CHAIRMAN. That can be satisfactorily arranged.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will wait till the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is through, with the understanding that I shall then be recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Townsend] has favored us with the repetition of a speech which I made some years ago upon the subject of salaries. I knew it was to come, and therefore I am not unprepared for it. I am not like the man who said he came unprepared, and then pulled out of his pocket a written speech. [Laughter.]
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. That was a democrat, Isaac

Hill, of New Hampshire. [Renewed laughter.]
Mr. RANDALL. Every word I then uttered I believed; every word then uttered was sincerely spoken, and after that vote and after that speech I went home; and while some of my constituents who had always co-operated with me politically condemned that vote, yet they gave me the same credit which the gentleman gives me to-day, that I was sincere and honest in both the vote and the speech, and they

I was sincere and honest in both the vote and the speech, and they returned me to this House, and in consequence I now occupy the exalted position assigned me by the Speaker of this House.

I am not, however, unmindful of the fact that the American people condemned that act; and I am manly enough to-day to say so. In obedience to their demand I give up my own opinion upon that question, and I stand here to-day in accord with the American sentiment, seeking to remedy what they have condemned. In addition I stand here as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and as the spokesman of that committee and of the democratic party in this respokesman of that committee and of the democratic party in this respect, to show that we mean to have economy, we mean to have re-trenchment, we mean to cut down the salaries of members of Congress along with those of all the rest of the officers of the Government. I believed then what I said, but my individual opinions have been overruled and I yield as a man should. In reducing these salaries I am in fact coming up to the demands of the people, as the gentleman will find out.

We have not gone indiscriminately into the reduction of salaries. We have reduced the salaries of almost every officer of this Government which exceed in amount $1,200, except of the Cabinet ministers. Mr. HOAR. You do not reduce the salaries of the judges of the

Supreme Court

Mr. RANDALL. The Constitution interfered there, and we could not do it.

Mr. HOAR. I know that; I thought the gentleman might like to qualify his remark. My suggestion was not in opposition to what he said

Mr. RANDALL. Wherever we possessed the power we have reduced all the salaries above $1,200. We reduced none at or below $1,200, because we thought that would work peculiar hardship on those receiving small salaries. Upon what ground could the committee possibly stand in reducing all other salaries 10 per cent., and not reducing their own? For one, if any man in the committee had favored such a proposition as that, I would have been utterly unwilling

Having reduced all salaries 10 per cent., as we conceived the necessities of the times required us to do, we then turned our atteunecessities of the times required us to do, we then turned our attention to supernumeraries; we fixed the amount of reduction of clerical force at 20 per cent. But lest we might overdo the matter in that respect, we turned to the statute, and we found that according to the law these employés are required during six months of the year to work eight hours a day and during the other six months ten hours a day. We found upon inquiry that until recently they were working but six hours daily, that within four or five months past the hours of labor have been increased to seven. We found therefore that even if we took off the entire 20 per cent. in numerical force, yet, if the hours of labor as fixed by law were adhered to, we should be able to get from the 80 per cent. of employés left more labor than has been performed by the existing force under the existing hours of labor performed by the existing force under the existing hours of labor required.

These are the facts. The reductions both as to salaries and numerical force were conducted with a system unvarying, excepting only the Cabinet ministers, and also the judges of the Supreme Court, with reference to whom the Constitution stepped in and prevented any diminution of their salary. Along with the other laws which the Ameridiminution of their salary. Along with the other laws which the american people have condemned, we propose to repeal also the increase of the salary of the President of the United States, providing that after the term of the present incumbent the salary shall be reduced from $50,000 a year to $25,000, the former figure.

In reference to the four classes of clerks that have been mentioned, we leave the first class at $1,200; the second class we reduce but $100; the third class but $150, and the fourth class $200. Yet we have made provision in special cases which we thought demanded it that clerks known as principal clerks should continue to have $1,800. The average reduction therefore which we have made as to these four classes of clerks is less than 10 per cent. And I would like to know how my colleague would have had us act? Upon what principle could we have proceeded except by the application of a 10 per cent.

reduction throughout the Government?

In regard to the expenses of collecting the customs, we found it somewhat difficult to reach the compensation of the custom-house officers throughout the United States, and I will tell you why. There has prevailed, according to my judgment, a pernicious system of paythese officers. Custom-house officers throughout the country are ing these officers. Custom-house officers throughout the country are paid from what is known as permanent appropriations. There is permanently appropriated $5,500,000, subject to the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to such sums as are received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The latter amount is estimated at $1,000,000 annually. So that the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of carrying on the collection of customs, has under his control, without any review by Congress, $6,500,000.

To-day the people are not made aware of the actual current expenditures of the Government for the reason that independently of the

To-day the people are not made aware of the actual current expenditures of the Government, for the reason that independently of the interest on the public debt and the amount necessary for the sinking fund, which is $130,000,000, nearly $20,000,000 goes out of the Treasury of the United States, and as to the mode of its expenditure no member of Congress has any control. This is, I think, one of the most pernicious systems ever known under any government. Twenty million dollars should not be taken out of the Treasury annually without any legislative review.

When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the last When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress [Mr. Garfield] announced to the country that the amount of appropriations last year for running the Government, independently of the interest on the public debt and the amount necessary to make good the sinking fund, was $179,000,000, it was in truth $199,000,000. I hope that before this session shall adjourn we shall remedy this abuse; and in this reform I believe we shall have the thorough co-operation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Reductions are as distasteful to me as they can be to anybody; and the man suffers relatively more than I do in connection with this re-

Reductions are as distasteful to me as they can be to anybody; and no man suffers relatively more than I do in connection with this retrenchment. But I stand here ready at all times, so far as in me lies, to execute the will of the people when plainly expressed; and it has been declared upon this question as clearly as any sentiment was ever expressed on any public question. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that nothing but frugality in the expenditures of the Government will save the Treasury from bankruptey; and I mean that we shall not reach that state of things while we have the power on this side of the House to enforce economy in administration. on this side of the House to enforce economy in administration.

Gentlemen on the other side preach economy, but when we propose to practice it they throw every possible obstacle in our way. That is their attitude to-day toward all our appropriation bills. They tell the people in one breath that they want economy, and then they condemn and sneer at every man who undertakes to enforce economy in its practical effects. I am glad to say that to this remark there are some honorable exceptions, for I should be derelict in my duty if I did not state that members of the Committee on Appropriations from the other side of the House have in the main and almost entirely co-operated with members of the committee on this side in these very reductions.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. There are two questions I would like to ask. First,

Mr. WHITE. There are two questions I would like to ask. First, did I understand the gentleman to say that he realized the fact that the country condemned his vote on the "back-salary grab?"

Mr. RANDALL. Well, now, it is none of your business what the country realized or what I realized. I have made my statement in that connection.

that connection.

Mr. WHITE. I want to ask the gentleman another question: Does he not think the country would have more belief in his sincerity in regard to this matter if that money were now refunded?

Mr. RANDALL. That is none of your business, sir.

Mr. WHITE. The country will judge of the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. My people have over and over again approved me in this place, and when I shall do aught here except what becomes a Representative they will take care to consign me back. I took that salary, the law gave it to me, my people have approved of me since, and it does not lie in the power of any miserable man here to talk about my conscience.

about my conscience.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, we have in this bill (H. R. No. 2571) the appropriation to supply the Agricultural Department for the coming fiscal year. It is one of the bills on the consideration of which it is relevant to discuss an agricultural interest that is now threatened with destruction. We have plumed ourselves on the theory that we are the granary of the world, and in many respects the theory is correct. But there are some cereals the cultivation of which in their highest perfection, owing to want of the proper seeds, knowledge of soil, and climate, and the adaptibility of the plant to new elements of growth have up to this time kept up nartially deabout my conscience new elements of growth, have up to this time kept us partially dependent on foreign countries. Among this special class of plants that we have not yet succeeded in bringing to perfection for some special uses is flax.

It will be the business of the Agricultural Department to gather through our representatives abroad seeds that are suited to our soil and climate so that they may assist the agriculturists of the country in saving us the many millions of dollars that we now pay for these cereals.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the numerous petitions that have been sent here from many of the northwestern States whose enterprising citizens have engaged in the production of flaxseed and in the manufacture of oil expressed from it.

The bill (H. R. No. 1711) introduced by Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, to change customs duties proposes to interfere seriously with this growing industry. The farmers of my State are looking in every direction for avenues in which they can diversify their industries. In 1870 we had a surplus of corn that would not bear transportation. We increased our live stock with which to convert corn into meat that would bear tronsportation, until our export of animal products equals that of our breadstuffs in value. We imported in 1873 2,679,795 bushels of flaxseed, costing $4,223,936; in 1874 we imported 2,647,208 bushels, costing $4,292,911.95; in 1875 the amount imported rose to 3,479,777 bushels, costing $5,729,095.

The increase in our imports is growing very rapidly, but our own people have not been idle in the mean time; for, while in 1870 the whole United States only produced 1,730,400 bushels of flaxseed, it is estimated that there was produced in the country in 1875 3,000,000 bushels. The census of the State of Iowa shows that while she only bushels. The census of the State of Iowa shows that while she only produced 88,621 bushels in 1870, she now produces 559,836 bushels, nearly one-third of what the whole United States produced in 1870. This industry in Iowa occupies 72,984 acres of land and gives employment to a great many people. But besides this it is one of the products of our soil that is manufactured at home. Oil-mills have been built in many of the counties of Iowa, and if unfriendly hands are not laid upon this industry in the interest of the pauper labor of Russia and British India, that, despite the duty now levied, sends us five million seven hundred and twenty-nine thousand and ninety dollars? million seven hundred and twenty-nine thousand and ninety dollars' worth of flaxseed annually, we will only have to wait a few years till the business of growing and manufacturing is so well established that nothing can disturb it.

Our people are remonstrating extensively againt the reduction of duty on seeds and oil as contemplated by the Committee of Ways and Means. The proposed legislation will be a repetition of our experience respecting our flax-fiber interest. We had ninety mills for making tow in the Northwestern States. The duty was taken off jute-butts in 1872, and every mill stopped. The last Congress by a large majority put back the duty; but we find it is easier to stay an industry by hostile legislation than to bring the component parts of a manufacturing establishment together. That legislation invited raw material from abroad, while our own rotted in the field. The result of reducing the duty on flaxseed and oil will be to stop the growth of flax in the Northwest altogether, and stop eighty oil-mills. These mills may be established on the Atlantic seaboard to crush foreign seed that is brought to this country as ballast. The oil-cake that we export to Europe is of more value at the seaboard than on the Mississippi; and looking at this question from a transportation stand-point, India is nearer our Atlantic seaboard than Iowa. The Morrison bill favors India at the expense of our own country, its cultivators and Oil will be increased in value by passing through the hands of numerous traders, and increased cost of transportation.

The remarkable growth of the flax interest in Iowa in the last few years shows conclusively that it is but a question of a few years when we will produce all our own flaxseed and make all the oil we use. There are but few industries we engage in that need any protection, and the people of this part of the Union, who are the purchasers of the manufactured articles of the East to such a large extent, have right to expect consideration.

The time will soon come, I hope, when many of the considerations that enter into this question will be eliminated. East India seed is cheaper, because the producer receives wages that would not support an American workman. The seed yields more oil, because we have not yet discovered all the scientific facts that enter into the production of the product not yet discovered all the scientific facts that enter into the production of first class flax. But it is only a question of time. We are driving Russia from the grain markets of Europe by the use of cultivated heads and hands and superior machinery on the farm. The time of five men one day in Iowa cuts and puts in the stack twenty-five acres of wheat. Give us a few years to study this industry in all its relations and we will not trouble Congress about it. We want time to study its value and nature, to adopt it into our cropping system, to apply machinery to its management in the field, and secure neighborhood organizations to manufacture the seed and fiber. The greatest drawback to western agriculture is the limited number of crop-plants whose cultivation is sufficiently understood to be profitable. The addition of every new plant to the list extends the time of seeding and harvesting. If its seed or fiber can be manufactured in the vicinity where it is raised, industry is diversified and transportation saved.

Capital and labor have been both high in the States that are now so rapidly coming up to the point of producing all the oil the country needs. The Northwest has been patient while paying increased prices for home-made articles of all kinds manufactured in the East, knowing very well that a home market would be created for our staples to supply the operatives. Many of the eastern manufacturers can now stand alone and are beginning to send something abroad from their shops. But an examination of the list of articles sent abroad in 1875 will show that if we exclude the products of the field, the forest, and the mine, not more than one-twentieth of our exports are from our shops, or about thirty of the six hundred and thirty million dollars' worth exported last fiscal year. So rapid has been the growth of our population and so great our own wants, manufactures have not to any great extent outgrown the wants of our own people. As the agricultural States accumulate wealth, as they are now very fast, the debts owing to the East will be paid off; the land will become the property of residents altogether; the price received for the large surplus crops will seek investment in industries in our towns and villages, with a view to consuming at home as much as possible the ever-increasing surplus.

Now that our people ask protection from the pauper labor of Russia and India on this article that they have been adopting into the list of crops, it is no more than fair, just, and equitable that the duty on these commodities should be retained on the statute as they are now. We are far from the seaboard; transportation consumes much of our profits. We have asked that extortion and discrimination on interstate railroads be prevented. But this House refuses to consider the question or allow a vote on a resolution I introduced declaring the power and duty of Congress in this respect. We attempt to evade the transportation tax by starting manufactures, and a western man, singularly enough from the great grain and meat raising State of Illinois, proposes to prevent the growth of new crops and the establishment of new manufactures. If this tariff bill had come from an eastern member, I could well understand the object. No eastern man, however, will have the hardihood to refuse us the benefit of a tithe of the laws necessary to raise revenue and incidentally protect labor while we are getting upon our feet in the manufacturing of our own raw material.

We owe obligations abroad as individuals, corporations, cities, States, and as a nation. We are an honest people and we mean to pay these debts; but we must earn the money before we can pay them. The industrious men of the nation on the farms, in the shops, in the forests, and in the mines must toil to prepare articles for sale, or our debt will never be paid. A struggle is going on between the workers of our country and other countries. Thousands of our workers are idle. Mr. Morrison's bill proposes to make idle several thousands more. Over seventy-two thousand acres in Iowa is to lie idle that has been raising flax, and the cultivators of these acres are to stand idle or raise corn to add to the one hundred and forty million bushels we now raise, in order to enable the Russians and Bengalese to sell us twice as much flax and oil as they sell us now and cripple our ability to pay our war debt. Is it either wisdom, justice, or public policy to stop our creators of wealth?

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, which provides for the regulating of interest by Congress and fixing the same at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent in every part of the United States, is one that I had the honor to present to this House. I regard the questions embraced within it the most important that can or will be brought before this Congress. The future happiness and prosperity of all the laboring interests of this country are involved within it. High interest has had more to do with bringing upon our people their present distresses than all other causes put together. It is the devouring moth that has consumed the substance of the business and laboring people of the country and retarded our national growth and prosperity. I therefore respectfully ask the House not to pass unfavorable judgment upon the bill until its merits shall have been fully discussed and understood.

In a country like ours, where we are blessed with every variety of climate that the wish of man could desire; with a productive soil, sufficient in quantity when properly cultivated and stocked to feed and clothe not only our own people, were our population tenfold what it is, but the whole world besides; and with minerals enough to supply the wants of mankind—with all these advantages and blessings, still the country is not prosperous. Its business is paralyzed; many of its workshops and manufacturing establishments are standing idle; the masses of the people are burdened with debt and taxation; the labor of the country is unemployed, and hundreds of thousands who want work, but cannot get it, are actually suffering for the necessities of life. These things should not be so. Yet they are stubborn facts that are looking us squarely in the face, and we have to meet them whether we want to or not.

What are the causes of this paralysis in business, and this distress of our people? They are various. Among them may be mentioned, overproduction, extravagance, destruction of property by flood and by fire, failure of large numbers of our business men, want of confidence in business among our leading capitalists. But the principal cause, and the one that lays at the bottom of all these I have mentioned, except loss by flood and by fire, is the enormous rates of interest that our people have been compelled to pay and are still paying in order to keep up their credit and carry on the business of the country. I mention overproduction as one of the causes of our present troubles; and when we take into consideration the high interest that our operators have had to pay for money in order to do business, it is one of the causes. But still we have not produced one-half what we should have done to give us the prosperity that we are entitled to and which we ought to have enjoyed had interest been at a rate that would have justified production.

With our vast deposits of coal and iron; with our rich and productive soil for the growth of food and cotton; with our unlimited supply of every variety of timber for the manufacture of all articles made of wood; with our advantages for the growing of wool; with our net-work of railroads; with our water-lines of transportation—with all these advantages for manufacturing and shipping our products to market we should not have suffered one pound of raw material to have left our shores, but everything should have been manufactured here, and the profits in so doing saved to our own people, and the surplus beyond what we needed for home consumption should have been sent abroad in American bottoms, built in our own ship-yards. But our trouble is now, and has been all the time, that these natural advantages are of no benefit to us, for the reason that most of the articles we manufacture, after they are produced, are not worth any more, and often not as much, as the cost of their production, on account of the high rates of interest that our manufactures have to pay for money to carry on business.

Men cannot afford to work hard all the year, and when they balance their accounts, find that the interest which they have had to pay for money in order to do business amounts to more than their clear profits on the work they have done. That has been and still is the real showing of the balance-sheets of a majority of our merchants, manufacturers, and business men who have had to borrow money in order to do business, until hundreds and thousands of them have become utterly discouraged, stopped work, and ceased to employ labor, and as their only relief from their embarrassment many of them have gone into bankruptcy. Hence our laboring people, who spend their money freely to make themselves and families comfortable when they have it, are without employment and without money to pay their debts or purchase the necessities of life.

Many gentlemen who are free-traders in money insist that it is our tariff laws that have closed against us the markets of the world, and have therefore dwarfed our productive industry and caused all this distress upon the country. They say that our high duties have kept us from manufacturing and shipping our products abroad, and competing with Europe in the markets of the world. When Great Britain to-day, with her cheap interest and cheap labor, is able to ship her manufactured articles to our own shores, pay our present duties, and then sell the articles in our own market as cheap as we can manfacture them here, on account of our high rates of interest. If our manufacturers could use money at low interest, they could furnish products to our own people at cheap rates, and we might then talk about competing with Europe with our manufactured articles in all the markets of the world, but not till then. It is therefore high interest, and not the tariff, that is hurting us, and preventing our prosperity; for under our tariff laws as they are we ship scarcely anything abroad, except our raw material. And still we purchase from Europe of her manufactured articles, as a general rule, more in value each year than the raw material we ship away, and that difference we have to pay in gold. If our tariff was made lower, and the rates of interest remained as they are now, the only result would be we would purchase more abroad than we have been doing, and have that much larger balance in gold to pay. We purchase enough now for our own good, and certainly want no changes in the tariff that would require us to purchase more, in order to make our revenue equal to what we now receive. For every manufactured article we purchase abroad, to that extent we rob labor here.

abroad, to that extent we rob labor here.

Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that if you could get the real and honest sentiments of all the people of the United States to-day, ten-twelfths of them would tell you that the paralyzed condition of the country, the failures and bankruptcy of so many of our business men, the suffering and want of our laboring people, are attributable more to the high rates of interest that they have had to pay for the use of money in order to do business than all the other causes put together.

The power of money to accumulate by interest is a subject that is not thoroaghly understood by our people; if it was, but few men could be found who would question for a moment the truth of the assertion that it is high interest more than every other cause that has paralyzed the country, broken down the business men, and driven so many of them into bankruptcy, and brought so much distress, misery, and want upon the laboring people.

To illustrate this power of interest, let me give a few examples

To illustrate this power of interest, let me give a few examples where the note is renewed at the end of each year and the interest included within it.

One dollar loaned one hundred years at—
1 per cent. would amount to	distant sile	$2 7	15
3 per cent		19 2
6 per cent		40 0
10 per cent
12 per cent
15 per cent
18 per cent
24 per cent	2, 551, 799, 4	04 0	N

If the notes were renewed every four or six months, instead of oucc a year, the increase would be much larger than the above figures show.

Most persons, without giving the subject reflection, suppose that money at 6 per cent. thus loaned would only be six times more in amount than when loaned at 1 per cent., but the figures show that it amounts to over one hundred and twenty-three times as much. And when loaned at 10 per cent., instead of its being ten times more than when loaned at 1 per cent., we find it amounts to more than five thousand times that amount, and over forty times as much as when loaned at 6 per cent. And when loaned at 12 per cent., which is 1 per cent. a month, the usual rate paid in my part of the State—Indiana—instead of it being only twelve times as much as when loaned at 1 per cent., we find it over thirty thousand times that amount, and about two hundred and fifty times as much as when loaned at 6 per cent. And as we increase the percentage, the increase in amount is much more rapid; in fact, the increase is so great, that its results are not only astounding, but alarming. For at 24 per cent. the interest, instead of being twenty-four times greater than 1 per cent., amounts to near a thousand million times more.

Now, if we will compare the results of labor for one hundred years with the results of these high rates of interest, we will see that labor stands no show whatever, for the reason that laboring men, as a general rule, neither lay up nor loan money, as it takes all their wages to properly support, clothe, and educate their families. What they earn they make it benefit the country, for they keep it in circulation.

The above figures show that one dollar in the hands of a capitalist loaned for one hundred years at 12 per cent. would lay up for its owner $84,675; while a laboring man in one hundred years, supposing him to work three hundred days in each year, at $1.50 per day, could only earn $45,000. So that one dollar loaned for one hundred years at 12 per cent. would earn for its owner during that time $39,675 more than a laboring man at $1.50 per day could earn during the hundred years. And at 24 per cent. the one dollar would earn for its owner $28,404 more than 56,706 laborers could earn during that time, supposing each man to work three hundred days in the year at $1.50 each per day. For the figures show that the one dollar for one hundred years at 24 per cent. would earn $2,551,798,404, while 56,706 laborers at $1.50 per day each for one hundred years, counting three hundred working days in each year, could only earn $2,551,770,000. Excess of interest over labor $28,404.

When we reflect that the annual increase in value of the whole country does not exceed 3½ per cent. under our present mode of doing business, and that all this increase in wealth is added by labor, how is it possible for labor to prosper while it has to pay to the money lender from 10 to 12 per cent. for the use of money to do business that yields only 34 per cent.? It must be remembered that the difference between the percentage of increase of wealth and the interest on money that is used in business is a tax upon labor, which keeps it oppressed and will continue to oppress it as long as high rates of interest are permitted.

If interest was so regulated by law that it could not in any case exceed 6 per cent., money-lenders would then be compelled to keep their money active. They could not afford to let it lie idle. They would either put it in business themselves or loan it to those who could afford to. The labor of the country would soon be employed to its fullest extent; manufacturing establishments would be multiplied by the thousand and laborers by the millions; substantial wealth would be rapidly added to the country, and the people relieved of their embarrassments; manufactured products would be cheap, and the markets of the world supplied from our workshops. Then the difference between the percentage of increase of wealth and that of in-terest on money would be very slight, and labor would be relieved of the burden of that difference, which has been hanging like a millstone upon its neck.

Many persons object to regulating the price of money by fixing the interest it shall earn, and say that you might as well undertake to regulate the price of wheat, corn, beef, hogs, labor, rents, &c., by law as to undertake to fix the price of money. There is no good sense in the objection, for the reason that money is not a commodity like wheat and corn. It is used to purchase or exchange commodities. Its value is not regulated by wheat and corn, but the value of wheat and corn is regulated by it. Money is the yardstick that measures the value of all articles in the market for sale or hire. If money is worth 6 per cent. and not allowed to go above that, then wheat, corn, labor, and rents will have a regular value in the market, for we generally find that there is about so much raised, and so much labor hired each year, increasing in amounts with the increase in population and wealth. But if the value of money is allowed to fluctuate so that one month it is worth 6 per cent., and the price of all articles is regulated by it, if the next month it is worth twice as much, say 12 per cent., then labor and all other commodities ought to double in price so as to keep pace with it; but the reverse is true. When interest is high then labor and the products of the farm are cheap, and times become hard. Hard, it is true, upon the labor of the country, but not upon the wealth, for the wealthy have the money and get twice as much for its use during these hard times as the laboring-men for their labor and products, and hence the burdens and miseries of hard times fall upon those least able to bear them.

But, says one, times are now hard, and still everything in the shape of food is dear in the market. How do you account for that? And why do you not regulate the price of these articles as well as that of money? Articles of food in the market are dear, not because of the price paid to the farmers who produce them, but because they are necessarily brought to market by middle-men, who are compelled to pay so much for the use of money and such high rates for transportation on account of high interest that when the articles are sold in the market at a reasonable profit to these middle-men they are necessarily dear, and in many cases the poorer classes of people in cities by reason thereof are compelled to eat inferior and often unhealthy food. Therefore I insist upon making money—which controls the price of everything else—cheap, and then all articles of food and clothing in the market will be correspondingly cheap to the consumers. There is no other way of regulating the price of articles in the market except by regulating the price of money.

But I am told that regulating the value of money by fixing the rate of interest is in opposition to the views of modern writers upon the subject of money as well as against the intelligence of the age; that interest must be regulated by the law of supply and demand, and not by statute; that usury laws are a humbug, a relic of the dark ages, and only serve to make interest higher instead of lower.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that that is the argument of the money lenders of the world. I know they think they represent the intellilenders of the world. I know they think they represent the intelligence of the age. They refer us to Great Britain and other European governments, where usury laws have long since been abolished, as proof of the fact that free trade in money—that is, letting the law of supply and demand regulate its price—makes interest cheap; for they say that interest is only 3 and 4 per cent. there. I admit that interest is cheap in Europe. Why? Because capital, not having been properly restrained there by law, has ground labor by its rates of interest until it has made paupers of all its laboring-people, and 3 and 4 per cent. is now all that it can squeeze out of them. Hence, that is now the rate of interest there. If labor could pay more, capital would exact more, for it takes every cent of the earnings of labor in Europe except a bare subsistence. Does any man within the sound of my voice desire that such a state of things shall ever exist in this country? Does any true lover of a republican form of government desire Does any true lover of a republican form of government desire to see the labor of this country reduced to pauperism? If not we must protect it by controlling the power of money. That can only be done by an act of Congress made broad and strong enough to prevent usury, for the States have not the power, as I will show; and the law of supply and demand cannot, for, under its operations, high interest has almost eaten up the country.

An act of Congress that will save the labor of the country from the usurious grasp of capital is called by our money-lenders a humbug, a relic of the dark ages. Why a law to prevent usury should be thus characterized I cannot understand. History does not warrant it; neither do the decisions of the legal tribunals of the country; for in the highest courts of both Europe and America, where the utility of usury laws have been thoroughly considered by the ablest judges who have ever sat upon the bench, with scarcely an exception these judges have all agreed that usury laws were an absolute necessity to protect the weak against the extortions of the strong.

Lord Redesdale, one of the ablest of the English judges, in closing an opinion in a celebrated usury case, said:

The statute of usury is constantly interposing its warning voice between the creditor and the debtor, even in their most secret and dangerous negotiations, and teaches a lesson of moderation to the one and offers its protecting arm to the other. I am not willing to withdraw such a sentinel. I have been called to witness, in the course of my official life, too many victims to the weakness and to the inflamed passions of men.

Chancellor Kent, one of the ablest of his profession in America, in a celebrated usury case before the court of errors of the State of New York, after thoroughly reviewing the history of the law of usury and its effects upon society, closed by saying:

I apprehend it would be perilous in the extreme to throw aside all the existing checks upon usurious extortion and abolish or traduce a law which is founded on the accumulated experience of every age.

Mr. Tyler, in his work on usury, written in 1872, on page 64, in speaking of our usury laws, says:

That in most cases the objections to these laws emanate from money-lenders themselves, and they are usually most prominent in making efforts to obtain their repeal; and, further, that it is the daily observation of every discerning business man that no person can continue for any considerable length of time in any legitimate calling who is in the constant habit of borrowing money at exorbitant interest; his failure is a foregone conclusion, and it is only a question of time. The probabilities therefore are that these legal restraints will still be continued in many or most of the American States, and that the time is at least far distant when the system will be permanently abandoned.

Our great treable in legislating by States is this: We have so many

Our great trouble in legislating by States is this: We have so many of them and their laws are so different that it is an impossibility for of them and their laws are so different that it is an impossionity for the people by State law to protect themselves against usury. For example, if the people of one State fix interest, say, at 6 per cent., and make the law so strong that no man dares violate it, the result is that the money-lenders of that State transfer their loans to some other State where interest is higher; and the people who made the law find it an injury instead of a benefit, for all their money is taken from them to other States. The law, therefore, remains on the statute-book a dead-letter for the reason that the people cannot afford to have it enforced. The States were not able to give us a currency such as we needed. Congress had it to do, and has given us just what we need; if we will only be satisfied with it until we are in condition to make it better, and if we ever get a law in this country, that will make interest cheap, and one that can be made effectual by its enforcement, that law will have to be passed by Congress. The States have not the power to protect their people against usury, for the reasons that I have given, even if they have the right to regulate interest upon national money, which I insist they have not unless Congress permits it.

The law of supply and demand, which many insist will regulate interest and keep it at reasonable prices, is beautiful in theory, but so far as regulating interest is concerned it is a failure in practice. I have no doubt it would regulate the price of interest as well as any other article in the market, if money-lenders and money-borrowers stood upon an equality and it was left free to operate according to the laws of trade. But money has such power that it can and does set at defiance the law of supply and demand whenever its owners will it, and they then control prices in the market to suit themselves, as the people of this country to their sorrow well know. For example: The amount of coffee that has been brought to this country the last few years was sufficient in quantity to supply the demand each year, and, therefore, according to the law of supply and demand, coffee should have been cheap; but, not with standing the supply was equal to the demand, coffee has not been reasonable in price; it has been much higher than it should have been. Why? Because a few capitalists went into the market and bought up all the coffee that was for sale and then fixed the price to suit themselves, and made the people pay it. The law of supply and demand, as laid down in the books, had nothing to do with regulating the price of this coffee. Its price was controlled entirely by the demands of capital.

So with money. I have no doubt but what there is plenty of money in the country to supply the demand for all legitimate business; but, like the coffee, it is in the hands of the few and they control its price. They know that business must be done and that it cannot be with-

So with money. I have no doubt but what there is plenty of money in the country to supply the demand for all legitimate business; but, like the coffee, it is in the hands of the few and they control its price. They know that business must be done, and that it cannot be without the use of money. They also know that the people are burdened with debt and must have money to keep up interest and pay these debts. They further know that the demands of these business men and debtors of the country for money will be so great that they will pay almost any price for its use that may be asked. They understand the amount of money that is in the country each day and know that it cannot be had except from them. With all this knowledge they have the money-borrowers entirely within their power and can and do exact such rates of interest as they see fit. The law of supply and demand has nothing more to do with regulating the price of interest upon the money that is loaned within the United States than it had in fixing the price of the coffee in the cases above referred to.

The speech that was made some days since by the distinguished gentleman from Maine was able, but it was devoted entirely to the question of making our money better, not making interest lower. That is not what the country needs. Our money is good enough now, if men could only get it at rates of interest that they could afford to use it in business and give employment to labor. If we could only put our people to work and get all of our manufacturing establishments again in full operation, we would soon grow out of our troubles and our people would be prosperous and happy. Low interest is the only thing that can or will revive business as it should be. Suppose we make our greenbacks equal to gold; how will that improve business? The men who have the greenbacks to exchange for gold will not put the gold into business when they get it; neither will they loan the gold to those who would any cheaper than they would have loaned the greenbacks before they were exchanged for gold. The trouble, as I have said, with the country is not because our greenbacks are not equal to gold, but because interest is so high that those who want to do business and give employment to labor cannot do so, for the reason that they can neither borrow the greenbacks nor the gold at rates that will justify them in doing business. Making our paper money equal to gold, unless we in some way lower interest, would only tend to make money more scarce and more difficult to borrow for business or to pay debts, and hence would aggravate instead of relieve the present embarrassments of our people.

I have no faith in the argument that our country is losing hundreds of millions each year because we do business with a depreciated currency, when we have to buy and sell at prices fixed by the gold standard; for the reason that our greenbacks, like our wheat and corn, are regulated in price, to a great extent, by gold. If a trader, therefore, goes out through the country and purchases wheat, corn, or any other product of the farm, with greenbacks, he knows the value of the greenbacks as compared with gold, and knows how much wheat is worth in gold, and can therefore easily tell how much he must pay per bushel in greenbacks to make it equal to the price of gold. The only risk he runs is this: Wheat may fall in price, and be cheaper when he has to sell than when he purchased, but that risk would be the same whether he purchased in gold or in greenbacks. But, even if we were upon a gold basis, still there would be an uncertainty in the value of our money the same as now, for the reason that we reckon our money by dollars and cents. Great Britain reckons hers by pounds, shillings, and pence. We alloy our gold more than Great Britain does hers, which makes the same weight of her gold of different value from the same weight of ours. Our gold coin does not circulate in Great Britain as money, but it goes at once to the melting-pot as soon as it reaches her shores and is coined into her kind of money. As it would require the calculation of experts to tell the value of our gold as compared with that of Great Britain, even if we were on a specie basis, it is but little more trouble to calculate the value of greenbacks as compared with gold. Our people have become accustomed to this difference in value, and bny and sell with special reference to it.

The only reason that our greenbacks are not now worth their face in gold is because the indebtedness of the country is so great that we cannot pay the gold for them. It takes all of our gold to pay interest upon our foreign indebtedness and settle our balances of trade.

The kind of financial system that we need is one that will make the country prosperous and enable us to pay our public debt as rapidly as possible, and save this eternal drain of gold interest; for when that is paid our greenbacks will then be worth their face in gold, because the custom duties of the country, being collected in gold, the surplus, with which we now pay interest, could then be applied to the redemption of our greenbacks, which would make them equal to gold. The banks would then have to redeem their notes in gold in order to make them equal to greenbacks.

Our debts were contracted under a greenback currency. It is but fair and right that they should be paid under it. But to pay them rapidly we must first make the country prosperous, then the people can and will stand to be taxed for that purpose. Prosperity can only

Our debts were contracted under a greenback currency. It is but fair and right that they should be paid under it. But to pay them rapidly we must first make the country prosperous, then the people can and will stand to be taxed for that purpose. Prosperity can only be brought about by putting the labor of the country to work to its fullest capacity and at living wages. To do that, interest must be made low, otherwise labor cannot be profitably employed.

To give the country a financial system that would accomplish these

To give the country a financial system that would accomplish these things, all that is necessary for us to do is simply this: repeal that part of the Sherman bill that requires us to commence redeeming greenbacks in gold on the 1st day of January, 1879. Let the volume of the currency remain as it is, give to the national banks $1 in currency for every dollar in bonds deposited by them, relieve them of all national taxation except just enough to pay the Government all expenses it incurs in their behalf. Fix interest by act of Congress so that national money could not be loaned by banks or individuals at a higher rate than 6 per cent. in any part of the United States. The capital of the country would then go into national banks, because it would be the most profitable way in which money could be loaned. National banking being free, it would expand the volume of the currency, not inflate it, to suit the growing wants of business and at rates of interest that the country could stand.

By this system the country would have all the money that it would need for business, and it would increase in value as rapidly as we paid our public debt, and when it was paid our money would be par in gold. In other words, by this system we would reach a specie basis through prosperity in business. By any other system that has been suggested we would reach it, either by additional taxation, caused by the issue of bonds with which to purchase gold for purposes of redemption, or by contraction, that is, withdrawing greenbacks from circulation by canceling so many millions each month, until we would render them so scarce that those which remained in circulation would answer every purpose of gold, and therefore would be worth their face in gold. Neither of the plans by taxation or contraction to reach a specie basis would be beneficial to the country in its present condition.

Some say if we do not use gold as a currency it will not stay in this country, but will go where it is needed. We need at least two hundred millions a year to pay custom duties and our balances of trade. That amount will certainly remain with us all the time, because its owners cannot get for its use any greater price than we pay; for that reason it will remain as an investment, if for none other. If we should resume specie payments gold would not be any cheaper to us, because it would go then, as now, where the largest price was paid for it. If our debts were paid, two hundred millions in gold would keep a thousand millions of national-bank notes in circulation on a specie basis, and that amount of gold we are compelled to use here all the time for the purposes above named; and the only thing that stands in our way of resumption is our public debt. Pay that, and then we are upon a specie basis, without taxation, contraction, or derangement of business. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to see resumption until our foreign debt is paid.

Many who oppose lowering interest by act of Congress insist that it can be cheapened by the issue of the 3.65 convertible and reconvertible bond. I have always supported that bond, not because I thought it would make interest cheaper to those who wished to borrow to engage in business, but because I believed it would enable the Government to get money at cheaper rates than it is now paying. Men who follow the business of loaning money, and from whom the people must borrow if they get it, would not loan their money to the Government for the interest provided for in these bonds, for the reason that they could get three times that amount by loaning it to people who have to borrow. The Government could not make permanent loans in the market on bonds drawing less than 5 per cent. interest in gold, payable semi-annually, even if these 3.65 bonds were issued. It would only be the money that was temporarily loaned that the Government could get the use of for these bonds—such as the short deposits of business men, the reserves kept in banks, the mites of laboring people that are kept in saving institutions so as to draw an interest until needed for use, and money of speculators that they keep to use at certain periods of the year and will not risk loaning it to the people, but want it to draw interest while idle and be ready whenever needed for use or speculation. These persons would not loan these bonds to the people for the reason that if they had wanted to loan their money they would have loaned it in the first instance at 10 and 12 per cent, without going to the trouble of purchasing these bonds which bear a low interest and then loaning them. How, then, will the issue of this 3.65 bond make interest lower to those who want to borrow money?

They are the men I am trying to protect.

Suppose these bonds were issued, and John Smith wanted to borrow $500. How would he get it? He would have to go to a bank, or a man who loaned money, for it. He would say to the cashier of the bank, or the money-lender, "I want $500. How much interest will you charge me for it?" In my State (Indiana) they would answer, 1 per cent. a month. John would say, "How is that? I thought the Government had issued the 3.65 bonds in order to make interest low." They would reply, "We know nothing about that. We do not invest our money in these cheap-interest bonds. We keep those who purchase these bonds." He starts off, and calls upon a speculator who has a safe full of them, and says, "Mr. Speculator, I want to borrow $500." The speculator replies, "I have no money to want to borrow $500." The speculator replies, "I have no money to loan. I keep it to speculate on. I have it all invested in 3.65 bonds." "Well," says John, "loan me the bonds; they will answer my purpose." The speculator replies, "How much interest will you pay me?" John says, "As the bonds draw you only 3.65 per cent. interest, I will pay you 6 per. cent." The speculator replies, "In two or three months from now I can make 15 or 20 per cent. on my money; therefore it is better for me to let it remain in my safe and draw 3.65 per cent. interest for a short time, until I can use it at 15 and 20 per cent, than loan it to you at 12 per cent." John, looking astonished, says, "I thought the Government issued these bonds in order to make interest cheap?" The speculator replies, "Yes, it is cheap to the Government; it is now using my money at 3.65 per cent. interest." John answers, "That is not the question. I care nothing about what interest the Government is using your money at. What I want to know is this, why I cannot get $500 at 6 per cent. interest when we have this 3.65 bond in use?" The speculator replies, "The 3.65 bond has nothing to do with making interest low to you men who have to has nothing to do with making interest low to you men who have to borrow money." John answers, "Why?" The speculator replies, "The Government does not issue these bonds to loan to the people like money, but only to exchange them with the people for green-backs. I have greenbacks, but I do not loan them. I keep them to speculate with, and in order to make them draw me interest while they are idle, I exchange them with the Government for these bonds. If you want to borrow money you must go to the banks or money-lenders, where they keep their money to loan, and do not invest it as I do in these 3.65 bonds." John answers, "I have been to the banks and the money-lenders, and they will not loan it to me for less than 1 per cent. a month, and that I cannot stand." The speculator replies, "That is cheap enough. If I loaned my money I would lator replies, "That is cheap enough. If I loaned my money I would not let it go at lower rates, for the reason that money is worth all we can get for it, and the more the better." John answers, "I would like to know, then, what good the 3.65 bond does, if I cannot borrow money for less than I per cent. a month?" The speculator replies, "It does me considerable good." John asks, "How?" He replies, "If it was not for this bond my money would lie idle for three or four months at a time, and would not pay me a cent; but now I deposit my greenbacks in the Treasury for these bonds, and get 3.65 per cent. interest on them while they are thus idle." John answers, "Then these bonds are issued simply to enable speculators to draw interest on their are issued simply to enable speculators to draw interest on their money while it would otherwise be idle, and for banks to draw an interest on their money reserves which they have to keep on hand under the law. I had always thought before that these bonds were ander the law. I had always thought before that these bonds were for the purpose of making interest cheap to the men who had to borrow money, but I now see they are issued for the benefit of the speculators and bankers, to get interest on their idle money." "O, no," replies the speculator, "they benefit the poor laboring people who have savings to exchange for them." John answers, "I do not know so well about that. The poor can get more than 3.65 per cent. in the savings-banks for their deposits, which is as good for them as this bond. But," says John, "Mr. Speculator, I started out to borrow $500. I cannot do without it. I must have it or lose my little home, and the money-lenders know it and they exact from me twice as and the money-lenders know it, and they exact from me twice as much interest as I can make out of the money. Hundreds of my neighbors are in the same condition, and, to my sorrow, I find that this 3.65 bond will not make interest low, so as to give us relief."

The above is a practical illustration of the manner in which the 3.65 bond will cheapen interest. Its only beneficial effect will be to cheapen interest to the Government on these temporary exchanges or loans that I have mentioned. The advocates of the bond insist that it is an absolute necessity in order to regulate the volume of the currency. For example, suppose more money should get in circulation than the legitimate business of the country needed, this surplus, they say, could be retired from circulation and put into the Treasury in exchange for these bonds. That is true; but if the Government did not at once put the money in circulation again by paying it out on its debts it would be compelled to pay interest on money it could not use, and the amount of interest thus paid would be that much additional burden for the people to carry, in order to enable capitalists to draw 3.65 per cent. interest on their idle money. Most men who are favoring the issue of more money do so for the purpose of having it plenty, while one of the avowed objects of the 3.65 bond is to retire money from circulation when it gets too plenty, and, in addition, make the people pay interest in order to get the money retired that most of them are in favor of keeping in circulation, and would not favor an issue of more money if they supposed it was thus to be retired at their expense. And on the other hand, if the Government did pay it out when it was thus exchanged for bonds, because too much was in cir-culation, it would inflict upon the business of the country the very injury that the advocates of the bond were trying to avert, by putting it into the Treasury in exchange for these bonds in order to keep it out of circulation.

Others favor cheapening interest by doing away with the national banks and issuing greenbacks to supply the place of the bank-notes. How will that make interest cheaper to the money-borrowers of the country? It certainly makes money no more plenty by retiring the national-bank notes and replacing them with greenbacks. Neither will it make our money better, for a bank-note will answer every legitimate purpose in business that a new greenback will. Many suppose that by doing away with the national banks we make a large saving to the country in the shape of interest on the bonds deposited by the banks, which might be purchased and retired with the new greenbacks issued to take the place of the bank-notes. But when we undertake to show a saving by the figures we fail in the attempt, for undertake to show a saving by the figures we fail in the attempt, for the reason that the taxes which the national banks now pay to the people of the various States and to the General Government are about equal to the interest on the bonds that the new greenbacks issued to take the place of the bank-notes would retire. So that, by doing away with the banks the people would lose as much, in the shape of taxes that the national banks now pay, as the interest they would save in the retirement of bonds, as the following figures will show:

On the 1st day of October, 1875, date of last Report of Comptroller of the Currency, the amount of bank-notes then in circulation was $318,350,379. If that amount of greenbacks had then been issued to take their place they would have purchased bonds one half 5 and the take their place, they would have purchased bonds one half 5 and the other half 6 per cents, counting the bonds at an average premium of 20 per cent., their market price, amounting to $254,680,314

Amount in currency saved by destroying banks...

Let us next inquire how much the people would lose by their destruction. By the organization of national banks stock is created, and it becomes taxable property in the various States and Territories where the banks are located, the same as other personal property.

On page 39 of the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency, made on the 1st day of October, 1875, he shows the amount of taxes paid by the banks to the States and to the General Government in the year 1875, which is as follows, to wit:

Amount paid to the States . $10,076,332 00

Amount paid to United States . 7,305,134 00
 Whole amount of tax paid by banks
 17, 381, 466 00

 Deduct amount of interest saved as above shown 16, 108, 529 00

The above statement shows that if the national banks had been done away and greenbacks issued to supply their place, the people, instead of gaining, would have lost this year $1,272,937. Some may urge that if the national banks were broken down most of their capital would go into private banking, and would pay not to the Government. Experience has shown us that the banks of the country, outside of the national banks, which have really three times as much taxable property as they have, do not pay one half the taxes that the national banks now pay. Not being under the control of the Government, they evade the law and escape being taxed. If our national banking capital is driven into private banks, it will follow the example of the private banks, and escape taxation as they do.

If we break down the national banks, we compel them to wind up, which will bring untold distress upon the country, as the people now owe them about $1,000,000,000, which would have to be paid. We would also strike out of existence over $500,000,000 of taxable property in the shape of bank stock, as shown by the Comptroller's report made October 1, 1875, on page 4, which stock now pays to the people of the States, in the shape of State, county, township, school, road, and corporation taxes, over $10,000,000. We would also strike out of existence the tax upon circulation paid by national banks, which last year amounted to over three and a quarter million dollars. We would also lose at least $2,000,000 in the shape of taxes on deposits that the national banks now pay each year by being under the control of the Government, which they would not pay if engaged in private banking, as they would evade the law as our private bankers now do. It would cost us near a million dollars more each year to keep up the printing of our greenbacks, if all of our currency was of that kind, more than it now does. These are serious losses, and should be fully con-than it how does. These are serious tosses, and should be fully considered by the people before they shall instruct their representatives to break down our national-banking system.

"But," says one, "by doing away with the national banks we will not strike out of existence taxable property to the amount of the national-bank stock, for the reason that the bonds, being converted into money, will be in the country to pay taxes in place of the bank-stock." Is that true? Let us see. Neither greenbacks nor bank-notes are taxable by the States, except by the consent of Congress. But for the sake of the argument we will admit that each are taxable, as other personal property, within the States. Then, while the banks are in existence, we have in the States two kinds of taxable property produced by them, to wit: bank-stock and bank-notes. Now, if we do away with the banks and issue greenbacks to supply the place of their notes we will have destroyed the bank-stock and the bank-notes, their notes we will have destroyed the bank-stock and the bank-notes, and will have in their place, within the States, but one kind of taxable property, to wit: greenbacks. By this destruction of the banks we have not gained one cent in money, for we have destroyed as much in bank-notes as we have issued in greenbacks; but in the operation we have lost as taxable property the amount of the bank-stock, which, on the 1st day of last October, amounted to $504,829,769.

Now, can any one see that we have produced any kind of property in this destruction of the banks that will take the place of this bank-stock destroyed and pay to the people of the States the same amount of taxes that it is now paying? "Yes," says one; "if the Government will take these greenbacks which it has issued to supply the place of the bank-notes and purchase gold with them, and with this gold pay off bonds, then the proceeds of these bonds will be in the country to pay taxes the same as the bank-stock." In this he is mistaken; for by this process we do not increase the property of the country one cent for taxable purposes. We simply exchange greenbacks for gold, cent for taxable purposes. We simply exchange greenbacks for gold, paying the difference in value, and with the gold we purchase bonds and then destroy them. This makes less bonds in the country, but it does not make any more gold or greenbacks than we had before, unless the gold is purchased abroad, and in that case we would send less the gold is purchased abroad, and in that case we would send abroad taxable property equal in value with the gold in order to purchase it. So that, while we would have more gold in the country to pay taxes, we would have that much less personal property which we gave for the gold to tax. But if the bank-notes had remained in circulation, would they not have purchased as much gold as the greenbacks with which to redeem bonds? In other words, would the greenbacks answer any purpose that the bank-notes would not have answered? If they would not, how can any one say that by issuing greenbacks to sumply the place of hank-notes we could nurchase any answered? If they would not, how can any one say that by issuing greenbacks to supply the place of bank-notes we could purchase any more gold with the greenbacks with which to redeem bonds than we could have purchased with the bank-notes? Then, if the greenbacks will not answer any purpose that the bank-notes would not have answered, what kind of taxable property can the greenbacks create that the bank-notes would not have created? If none, then we must lose by the destruction of the banks taxable property to the amount of the bank-stock. This stock was created as taxable property by the mere subscription of it on the books of the company, and when the banks are broken down that amount of taxable property will become extinct, like so much personal property consumed by fire. By doing away with the banks we save interest on the bonds we retire and lose tax on the bank-stock and bank-circulation we destroy. One is about equal to the other, as I have shown by the figures. So nothing is gained to the people by so doing.

In my judgment it would be unwise legislation to repeal the national-banking law and substitute greenbacks for our entire circulating medium; for several reasons:

First. It would not make our money any cheaper to the people, as

I have shown.

I have shown.

Second. It would depreciate our money in value, for this reason:
Our present greenbacks, which amount to $371,273,140, are now worth 14 per cent. less than gold, because the Government is not able to redeem them in gold, and this depreciation we cannot prevent. If, then, we are not able to redeem our present volume of greenbacks in gold, and for that reason they are 14 per cent. discount, if we should double their amount, would we not be that much less able to redeem, and in the proportion of our inability to redeem would they not in that proportion at least depreciate in value? That loss would fall upon the people and add that much additional to their present burdens. But if we retain the banks, and do not increase the volume of our greenif we retain the banks, and do not increase the volume of our green-backs, and will go to work and pay our debts, we can make our pres-ent greenbacks increase in value, and as they increase the bank-paper ent greenbacks increase in value, and as they increase the bank-paper must increase in the same proportion, because it is redeemable in greenbacks; and when we pay our debts and our greenbacks are worth their face in gold the banks of the country must make their notes equal to gold; and then the expense and trouble of redeeming the money of the country will be thrown upon the banks, where it should be, and not upon the Government; and the banks being scattered over the country will make redemption and exchanges of money convenient to the people.

Third. If our entire circulating medium is convessed of greenbacks.

Third. If our entire circulating medium is composed of greenbacks, they must be issued, and re-issued as fast as worn out, by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. All officers within that Department are under his control.

The authority to issue all the paper money required for circulation

The authority to issue all the paper money required for circulation in this country, as well as the cancellation and destruction of the old and worn-out bills and their re-issue, is more power than ought to be placed in the hands of any one man. For upon his honesty would depend the safety and solvency of all the money in the country. The collecting and disbursing of the public revenues, with the present duties of the Treasury, are about enough for any one Department of the Government. If the Secretary, with this unlimited power to issue and re-issue our money, was disposed to act dishonest, an overissue of millions of money could be put in circulation, which, as soon as discovered, would at once unsettle values, destroy all confidence in business, ruin the credit of the Government, and bankrupt us as a nation. The people therefore, should study well this question before inau-

The people, therefore, should study well this question before inaugurating a financial system where its whole safety hangs by so slender a thread as the honesty of one man. The risk of such a policy is too great. One fatal step would be more disastrous to the country than ten such wars as the late rebellion, because it would destroy all faith, all hope, and all credit in the future

By issuing our money through national banks, we have a system of checks and balances that will prevent an overissue and always keep our money safe and reliable. No bank-bills can be put in circulation until signed by the bank officers. The banks being private corporations, and responsible for all their notes, would see that none would get in circulation through the Treasury except those signed by them. The banks would act as a check upon the Government, and in turn the Government would act as a check upon the banks, and see that they put no bills in circulation beyond the security de-posited for their redemption with the Secretary of the Treasury in the shape of bonds worth their face in gold.

Others insist that if our greenbacks were made a legal tender for every debt due to and from the Government, including custom duties, that would make greenbacks equal to gold, and would relieve the country of its present embarrassments, and reduce interest to a legitimate rate. In this I think they are mistaken. Congress has not the power to make greenbacks a legal tender for the interest on our the power to make greenbacks a legal tender for the interest on our Government bonds, unless the bondholders would consent to it; for the reason, the acts of Congress under which the bonds were issued and sold expressly provide that the interest should be paid in gold. And we must pay it in gold unless we repudiate our contracts, and that we could not afford to do under any circumstances, for national honor is worth more to us than money. I can see no benefit that the people would derive from making our greenbacks a legal tender for more than one-fifth of the custom duties; for this reason the Government must have eachyear at least $150,000,000 in gold in order to pay the interest upon our public debt, pay our foreign ministers, and leave ment must have each year at least $150,000,000 in gold in order to pay the interest upon our public debt, pay our foreign ministers, and leave a surplus in the Treasury sufficient to break rings that might form in order to put up the price of gold. If we did not raise gold from custom duties how would the Government get it? It would have togo into the market and purchase it. What would be the result? The gold brokers from whom the gold is now purchased by the people, knowing that the Government must have gold in order to meet its engagements to pay interests on its bonds, would set up the price on the Government as they did on the people on Bleak Friday, when gold the Government as they did on the people on Black Friday, when gold went up 35 per cent. in an hour. The ring that then held the gold was bursted by the Government opening its vaults and selling gold to the people, which saved thousands from being bankrupted. But if the customs in the future are paid in greenbacks and not in gold, the Government will have no gold with which to break these rings, and the result will be that the gold will cost the Government a much higher price than it now costs the people; for the reason these gold-brokers while the Treasury has a surplus of gold in its vaults are afraid to make more corners against the people, because they know if they did that the Government would do as it did on Black Friday, if they did that the Government would do as it did on Black Friday, open its vaults and sell gold to the people, and then they would be the losers; for it costs something to get up these rings.

Nothing could prevent corners being made on the Government by the gold ring in the purchase of gold, because the Government would be entirely powerless. It must have gold, and could not get it except from the ring, and it would have to pay the ring's price. It would have no power to dictate terms to the ring, but would have to submit to the ring's terms. The Government is nothing but the people, so that if we relieve the people from purchasing gold and paying custom duties by taking greenbacks for them and throw that burden upon the Government, if it costs the Government more, the people have that additionals cost to pay, for the reason, as I have said, the Government is but the people. While our interest is payable in gold nothing can be gained to the people or the country by making all of our customs payable in greenbacks. We must have at least one hundred and fifty millions collected in gold, otherwise we will lose instead of gain. It will not do for the people to suppose that the Government fifty millions collected in gold, otherwise we will lose instead of gain. It will not do for the people to suppose that the Government could go into the market and purchase gold with greenbacks, dollar for dollar, even though the greenbacks were made a legal tender for everything except the interest on the Government bonds; for as long as interest is payable in gold and not greenbacks, gold will be worth more than greenbacks, because interest must be paid, and it cannot be done except in gold. These gold brokers know that, and know that the gold cannot be had except from them; and when the Government and not the people is made the purchaser, the gold ring will fix the price and the Government will have it to pay, and the percentage on gold will be higher then than now. But if we keep the law substantially as it is, and make the people do the purchasing of the gold, then the Government, with its surplus in the Treasury, can stand behind them and protect them against these rings.

Having discussed the various modes suggested by others for lowering interest, and given, as I think, sound reasons why they will not accomplish it, I come now to the important questions suggested in my bill:

First. Has Congress the power to regulate interest on national money?
Second. Is it expedient for it to do so?

As to the first question, I do not think there can be much doubt. The Supreme Court of the United States, in 8 Wallace, pages 548 and 549, uses this language:

Congress has undertaken to supply a currency for the entire country. * * * It now consists of coin, of United States notes, and of the notes of the national banks. Both descriptions of notes may be properly described as bills of credit, for both are furnished by the Government; both are issued on the credit of the Government; and the Government is responsible for the redemption of both—primarily as to the first description, and immediately upon default of the bank as to the second. * * Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end Congress may restrain by suitable enactments the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its authority. Without this power indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile. must be futile.

This is the decision of the Supreme Court that declared the act of Congress which imposed a tax of 10 per cent, upon all banking institutions that paid out the notes of State banks constitutional. Now, if Congress has the power to tax out of existence the notes of State banks, in order to secure to the people the benefit of this national currency, has it not equally the power, to further secure its benefits to the people, to say that this money shall not be loaned in any part of the People, to say that this money shall not be loaned in any part of the United States at a higher rate of interest than that fixed by Congress?

In the case of The Farmers and Mechanics' National Bank of Buf-falo vs. Peter C. Dearing, decided at the October term of said court, 1875, and not yet reported, this point was involved: By the laws of the State of New York, where money is loaned at a higher rate of in-terest than that allowed by the laws of that State, the bank or per-son loaning the money forfeits not only the interest but the principal son loaning the money forfeits not only the interest but the principal also. The national banking law provides that where an association under that law loans money at a greater interest than that allowed by the law the bank shall forfeit the interest only. This Farmers and Mechanics' National Bank was located within the State of New York, and in this particular case charged a greater rate of interest than that allowed by the State of New York. The question to be decided in the case was this: which law would prevail, the law of the State of New York, which forfeited both principal and interest of the debt, or the act of Congress chartering the national banks, which forfeited the interest only. The Supreme Court held that the law of Congress prevailed. In the decision the court uses this language: gress prevailed. In the decision the court uses this language:

gress prevailed. In the decision the court uses this language:

The national banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the Government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end. Of the degree of the necessity which existed for creating them Congress is the sole judge. Being such means, brought into existence for this purpose, and intended to be so employed, the States can exercise no control over them nor in any wise affect their operation except in so far as Congress may see proper to permit. Anything beyond this is "an abuse, because it is the usurpation of power which a single State cannot give." Against the national will "the States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impade, burden, or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the General Government. " The principle announced in the authorities cited is indispensable to the efficiency, the independence, and indeed to the beneficial existence of the General Government. The principle announced in the authorities cited is indispensable to the efficiency, the independence, and indeed to the beneficial existence of the General Government. Otherwise it would be liable, in the discharge of its most important trusts, to be annoyed and thwarted by the will or captice of every State in the Union. Infinite confusion would follow. The Government would be reduced to a pitiable condition of weakness. The form might remain, but the vital essence would have departed. * * It must always be borne in mind that the Constitution of the United States and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land, * * and that this law is as much a part of the law of each State, and as binding upon its authorities and people, as its own local constitution and laws.

In the above opinion the court says that—

In the above opinion the court says that-

The national banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the Government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriated to that end.

The bills of the national banks are just as much instruments designed to be used to aid the Government as the banks themselves, and they are means just as appropriate to that end, and were so intended by the General Government, as it made itself responsible for their redemption. The Supreme Court, in 8 Wallace, above referred to, page 549, classes the bank-notes and greenbacks together, and declares them bills of credit of the United States. In 7 Wallace, page 29, the court, in speaking of the greenbacks, uses substantially the same language used above in reference to the banks. It says:

That these notes were issued under the authority of the United States, and as a means to ends entirely within the constitutional power of the Government.

If the greenbacks and bank-notes, then, are bills of credit of the of the greenbacks and bank-notes, then, are bills of credit of the Government, issued to serve the purposes of the Government, then the Government has as much power over them as it has over the banks; and, if it has the power to say what interest the banks shall charge in the States, it has equally the power to say at what interest its bills of credit shall be loaned in the States, so as to make them useful to the Government and beneficial to the people.

The court in the same case, in speaking of the powers of the Government, says:

In the complex system of polity which obtains in this country, the powers of the Government may be divided into four classes: Those which belong exclusively to the States; those which belong exclusively to the National Government; those which may be exercised concurrently and independently by both; and those which may be exercised by the States, but only with the consent, expressed or implied, of to issue bills for circulation; but it is the banks and not the States that are compelled to redeem these bills.

Congress has not only the power to coin money, but it has also the power to emit bills of credit, such as our greenbacks and bank-notes, and make them money. The Supreme Court in 8 Wallace, page 548, in speaking of the power of the Government to emit bills of credit, says:

speaking of the power of the Government to emit bills of credit, says:

There can be no question of the power of the Government to emit them; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to provide for their redemption; to make them a currency, uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation. These powers, until recently, were only partially and occasionally exercised. Lately, however, they have been called into full activity, and Congress has undertaken to supply a currency for the entire country.

Congress having taken hold of the question of furnishing the people with a money to do business, it has the entire power and control over that money. The States cannot do anything that will in any way in-terfere with it; their powers are in "abeyance;" they can neither tax it or regulate its interest; that power belongs exclusively to Con-

In 12 Wallace, page 545, the Supreme Court of the United States

The States can no longer declare what shall be money or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated.

From the above decisions it is clear that Congress has the power to supply a currency for the entire country and secure its benefits to the people, and that the States have no power over the currency in any manner, shape, or form.

It further appears that in pursuance of that right Congress has provided a currency composed of coin, of United States notes commonly called greenbacks, and national-bank notes.

It further appears from these decisions that the States have not the power by taxation or otherwise, except by the consent of Congress, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the General Government.

execution the powers vested in the General Government.

If the power of Congress, then, is supreme over all questions affecting the currency, can any one doubt, if Congress in the exercise of its legal powers should think it necessary, in order to make this currency more beneficial to the people, that it should fix by law the rate of interest at which it should be loaned in every State and Territory within the United States? Could any one say that Congress had not the power to do so? If Congress has supreme power over this currency, and exercises it, the States would have no authority to regulate it in any way, for the laws of Congress are supreme within the States. If the States have not the power to tax these greenbacks and States. If the States have not the power to tax these greenbacks and bank-notes except by consent of Congress, because they are bills of credit of the United States, for the reason to admit their power to tax them would admit their power to destroy them, for they might put the tax so high that they could not circulate within the States, so with interest on this national money. If it is admitted that the States and not Congress have the power to fix the rate of interest at which this money shall be loaned, then it is the States and not Congress that have the power to regulate its value. This money would be almost worthless if it could not circulate and earn an interest. If the States, then, have the power, and should see fit, they could declare by State law that these greenbacks and national-bank notes should not be loaned within the States at a higher rate of interest, say, than 1 per cent., or at a lower rate, say, than 15 per cent.; either would destroy their usefulness to the Government and to the people, for the reason that in one case the interest would be so low that the money would be almost worthless, and in the other the interest would be so high that the people could not afford to use it. In either case the usefulness of the money would be as effectually destroyed as by taxing it 25 per cent.

If Congress has the power to furnish the people a national currency, and the States have no authority to interfere in any way, certainly it has the power, whenever it sees fit to exercise it for the good of the people, to say at what rate of interest that currency shall be loaned within the United States. Congress by law declared what interest the national banks should charge, and where the bank law and the State law come in conflict in the State of New York the Supreme Court decided that the bank law massed by Congress prevails and Court decided that the bank law passed by Congress prevails, and the State law had to give way. If we once admit that the States, and not Congress, have the power to regulate interest on national money, then we must admit that the States, and not Congress, have the then we must admit that the States, and not Congress, have the power to regulate the value and usefulness of that money; for its value and usefulness to the people, to a very great extent, depend on the interest at which it can be used. I hold that Congress has supreme power over the national currency, and can fix the rate of interest at its pleasure at which it shall be loaned to the people in every part of the United States.

Second. Is it expedient for Congress to regulate interest?

It must be evident to every one that interest is now too high, more than legitimate luminess can pay. The question, then is, What are may be exercised by the States, but only with the consent, expressed or implied, of Congress.

Whenever the will of the nation intervenes exclusively in this class of cases the authority of the State retires and lies in abeyance until a proper occasion for its exercise shall recur.

The States have no power to coin money; neither have they the power to issue paper money. All the power that they have on this subject is simply the right to charter State banks and authorize them be done to prevent it? How is interest to be cheapened? The money lenders say, "Let the laws of trade, supply and demand, regulate the price of money; then the country will be prosperous." Others say the States must regulate the rates of interest on money; that Congress has no power over the subject. I have shown that the law of supply and demand will not regulate interest and make it cheap. and demand will not regulate interest and make it cheap. I have also shown that the States have not the power to do so; for under the operations of the State laws and the law of supply and demand high interest has almost eaten up the country. I have shown that the 3.65 bond cannot lower it to the money-borrowers, who give employment to labor. Neither will the breaking down of the national banks and substituting the greenbacks in the place of the bank-notes do so. Then how can it be done? I see no earthly way, unless Congress will take hold of the question and make a law fixing the rate of interest at which our national money shall be loaned in every part of the United States; make that rate not exceeding 6 per cent, and then United States; make that rate not exceeding 6 per cent., and then with the strong arm of the Government enforce the law, compel every person to obey it or suffer the penalty. Six per cent. is as much as legitimate business can pay. If those who have money will not loan it at that rate, let them keep it or put it in business themselves. What the country wants is for our money to be put in circulation. It makes no difference who does it, so that it is done; but if it has to be by borrowers, then I want it to be at a rate of interest that will justify the employment of labor in legitimate business. If interest is low, money-lenders cannot afford to let their money remain idle; they must keep it active, so as to make it earn a livelihood for Low interest is what the country needs in order to revive business and give employment to labor at living wages. The question of the quality or quantity of our money is but secondary to the question of low interest. The masses are satisfied with our paper money, and I have no doubt but what there is sufficient in quantity to do all legitimate business, if interest was only low enough to justify its use by the people. If Congress should issue a thousand millions of greenbacks the people could not get this money unless they had something to exchange for it, either property or labor. I care not how much money we put in circulation, it will soon get into the hands of the few. And, unless we fix the rate of interest by law, beyond which it cannot be And, unless we fix the rate of interest by law, beyond which it cannot be loaned, these few will fix the rates to suit themselves, and it will be so high that it will constantly grind labor, because labor must bear the burden of loss between the per cent. of money and the per cent. of increase in the growth of the country. It is a mistaken notion to suppose that Congress can give prosperity to the country by issuing greenbacks. Prosperity must come, if at all, from labor, and not from acts of Congress. All that Congress should do is to see that the country has a sound currency, free from monopoly, and in such shape that its volume will be controlled by the demands of business, and not by the whims of Congress, and at a rate of interest that legitimate business can afford to pay, in no case exceeding 6 per cent.

The people must learn that in order to get greenbacks they must rely upon their labor, and not upon Congress. If the farmer wants greenbacks he must cultivate the soil properly, and in the fall have rely upon their labor, and not upon Congress. If the farmer wants greenbacks he must cultivate the soil properly, and in the fall have plenty of corn, wheat, pork, and beef to sell, and I will insure him plenty of greenbacks. If the blacksmith wants them, he must pound them out on his anvil and he will have plenty. The carpenter must plane them out of the plank he works up, and he will be in the same condition. And so of all other kinds of business. Greenbacks must come to the people through labor; they cannot come in any other way so as to give prosperity; but in order to insure this prosperity in the country money must circulate freely and at a rate of interest that will justify business and enable it to keep the labor of the country constantly employed. constantly employed.

Some say there is no necessity for this law; that interest is now cheap enough in the East; that millions of money can be had there at 5 and 6 per cent. I have no doubt it can now be had at that rate if you give national bonds as security and agree to pay on call. But because it is thus cheap is no inducement for men of enterprise to borrow it and engage in business that will give employment to labor. Why? They know as soon as they do and the country begins to look prosperous, then these money-lenders will commence raising interest on them and they will be forced to pay their high rates or lose everything they invest. Therefore they cannot make anything by thus engaging in business, for the reason that the money-lenders by their high rates of interest get all the cream of their profits, and leave nothing for them and the laborers they employ to do the work but skimmed milk.

This cry of cheap interest in the East, therefore, is but a snare to men of enterprise. It is a nice thing to induce them to commence business, but its sudden growth, as soon as business is fairly established, is what hurts them and deters men of enterprise from engaglished, is what hurts them and deters men of enterprise from engaging in pursuits that would give the country the prosperity it so much needs. Going into business now is like going into a fair—it only costs a dollar to get in, but fifty to get eut. If men could know when they engage in business that interest could not rise on them, when they got fairly under headway, beyond 6 per cent., then they could and would engage in it all the time; but while they know that as soon as they commence interest will then start up and increase just fast enough to eat up all the profits, they prefer to let manufacturing and other business alone, and that is the principal reason why the business of the country is paralyzed and the labor of the country unemployed. If our eastern friends think that 6 per cent, is enough for money, and that that is all their money-lenders exact, then this law I propose will not hurt them. It will only make certain what is now uncertain, that is, it will fix interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. which might go beyond that amount.

Some insist that we cannot enforce a 6 per cent. interest law. That is what the whisky ring believed when we made the law putting the tax on whisky so high, but the experience of the last few months has converted them, and they now believe it can be. And if gentlemen will examine the provisions of the bill No. 1226, now on their files, which I had the honor to present, they will come to the conclusion that it would be safer to violate the law regulating the tax on whisky than that regulating the interest on money, if it was once enacted in-

I do not contend that Congress has the power to regulate interest on contracts made by the people of the same State, where the loaning of national money does not in any way directly or indirectly enter into the contract. For example. If a man sells his farm, stock, grain, or the like, and the purchaser executes his notes, the interest that such notes should bear should be regulated by the State. And the owners of such notes should be left free to dispose of them at such rates of discount as allowed by the laws of that State. The object of the bill under discussion is to regulate the interest on all national money hired, loaned, or used in business.

If capital remains unrestrained in this country and the money-It capital remains unrestrained in this country and the moneylenders are left free to charge any amount of interest that they can contract for without reference to what per cent. legitimate business will pay, as all the financial plans now before the country permit, interest will continue much higher than the per cent. of increase on business throughout the country, and that difference must and will be ground from the sweat and toil of labor. If this grinding process is continued it will be but a few generations until capital will control the labor of this country, the same as it does the labor in Europe. To allow that to be done would be worse than a crime. But that result is as allow that to be done would be worse than a crime. But that result is as inevitable and certain, unless we restrain the power of money, as that the weak must give way to the strong when they come in contact. History, as well as our own experience, teaches us that capital unrestrained will grind labor. With that knowledge, can any Representative on this floor refuse his assent to a law the purpose and effect of which are to prevent this great injustice by using the strong arm of the Government to cheapen interest, so as to shield and protect the laboring and business men of the country from the impoverishing grasp of capital?

Mr. BENNETT obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. RANDALL, who

The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Holman having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. COOK. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 987) to transfer the conduct of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department, and to move that it be recommitted and ordered to be printed, and to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do not object if it is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. COOK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider.
Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman propose to leave the motion to econsider pending?
Mr. COOK. Yes; but I do not propose to call it up until there is full House

Mr. RANDALL. The motion to reconsider can only be carried by Mr. HARAEL. The motion to reconsider can only be carried by a majority.

Mr. HOAR. I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not before the House, objection being made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HATCHER for twenty days on account of important business; to Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, for four days; and to Mr. LAWRENCE for two weeks from Tuesday next.

And then, on motion of Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, (at five o'clock and eight minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in relation to a proposed canal from some point between the mouth of the Rock River and Clinton, Iowa, on the Mississippi River, to the Illinois River, at Hennepin; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Whereas the question of cheap transportation for the surplus products of the Mississippi Valley to a profitable market is at the present time the paramount question; and whereas we believe that the construction of a canal from some point between the mouth of the Rock River and Clinton, Iowa, to Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, would open an unbroken water communication to the eastern markets from the largest agricultural region tributary to any single artificial water-way which has been proposed; and whereas this line has been surveyed by authority of Congress, and has been found to be practicable, to be a distance of only sixty miles, and to be capable of construction at small cost in comparison with other projects of this character: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iova, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives therein be requested to vote for and to use their active influence to secure such legislation by the National Legislature as will insure the construction of this canal at an early day.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy hereof to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

LIEUTENANT JOHN A. SHAW.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 509) for the relief of John Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 509) for the relief of John A. Shaw, to report it without amendment and submit a report thereon. If there be no objection I should like to have the bill considered at the present time. It will only take a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to place the name of John A. Shaw on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company G, One hundred and twenty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, as of the date of November 18, 1864, and with the same force and effect as if he had been duly mustered into service as such first lieutenant on that date, and also authorizes the proper acsuch first lieutenant on that date, and also authorizes the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay to John A. Shaw the pay and allowances of first lieutenant of infantry from the 18th of November, allowances of first heutenant of infantry from the 18th of November, 1864, to the 22d of April, 1865, less any pay and allowances, or either, already received by him for such period.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say in connection with this bill that Lieutenant Shaw was duly commissioned by the governor of Illinois, Governor Yates, on the 18th day of November, 1864, as first lieutenant to fill a vacancy which had occurred on the 27th day of September, 1864, that he control was the discharge of the duties as forthing. 1864; that he entered upon the discharge of the duties as first lientenant, and continued discharging those duties until the 22d of April, 1865, when he was duly mustered into the service; that he was not mustered prior because of being in active military service; and that he was at the battle of Nashville, Tennessee, and was there severely he was at the battle of Nashville, Tennessee, and was there severely wounded while acting as first lieutenant, commanding his company, and leading it gallantly in that fight. He has never been paid, because of not having been mustered, and it was not his fault.

The bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if there are not a great many cases similar to this of persons who had been appointed as officers but were not mustered in until a much later period? I think that the question has been often discussed here.

discussed here.

Mr. COCKRELL. My understanding is that where there was a vacancy and where the officer entered upon the actual discharge of the duties of the office, he has always been paid although he was not mustered immediately. In this case the officer could not be mustered. It was not his fault that he was not mustered. He was in active military service, was very severely wounded in the head at Nashville, Tennessee, was in the hospital, and made his way from there to Green. ville, Alabama, and was mustered in just as soon as he could meet with a mustering officer. I am informed by the chairman of the Military Committee that in all these cases they have uniformly been paid, but not in a case such as was suggested by the Senator from Vermont, where simply they may have been appointed to an office and there was no vacancy, and they may not have actually performed the service. Lieutenant Shaw's rank took effect on the 27th of September.

1864. That was the date of the vacancy; but he did not enter upon duty until the 18th day of November; and this bill is only to pay him from that date up to the date of actual muster, the muster not being made in consequence of his not being able to meet with a mustering officer on account of his actual service in the field.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the report accompanying the bill be printed, so that it may be sent to the other House with the bill. The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith, to report it without amendment and submit a report thereon. If there be no objection, I ask that the report, which is very short, may be read; and I will then move the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object, for I do not like the example. I ought to have objected to the bill just reported which passed, but I saw the amount was very small and the merit of the case seemed to be obvious.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill is only to give Major Smith credit for $166, and all the facts are set forth in the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course the facts are set out in the report, but I do not think we ought to act finally upon bills when the Senate is so thin. If it goes on the Calendar, undoubtedly it will be passed when reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 518) to anthorize the Third Auditor of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri to State troops serving in the Union Army, and also the evidence as to supplies furnished to troops, and which are yet unpaid, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1231) for the relief of the board of trustees of the Antietam national cemetery, reported adversely thereou.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William H. French, jr., late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota Territory, praying to be relieved from liability for certain cattle received at said agency and receipted for by him and that a bill may be passed authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to adjust and settle his accounts as such Indian agent, deducting the price of said cattle, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memo-rial of late volunteer officers wounded in the United States service, showing the inequality between those pensioned and those retired, and praying for an equitable adjustment of pensions granted to officers as compared to those of enlisted men, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 583) to incorporate the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know whether this bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on the Judiciary. It relates to the allowance or claims by the Logan. Mr. LOGAN. I suggest that it had better go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care to which committee it is referred.

I will state, however, that the bill contains three short sections. One declares that a claim once reported against by the head of a Department shall not be renewed. Another is, that no claims shall be allowed by the head of a Department after two years. Another is that a requisition by the head of a Department shall not preclude or exclude a full examination of its legality and merits. That I believe is the old law, but I think it is well enough to revive it in the statutory law in these times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. KEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 586) for the relief of Henry A. Kelly; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 587) for the relief of Jacob Theirer; which was read twice by its title, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 588) for the relief of V. B. Bean; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 589) for the removal of all railroad tracks to introduce a bill (S. No. 589) for the removal of all railroad tracks using steam power from the public streets and avenues of the Federal capital; which was read twice by its title.

Mr EDMUNDS. I introduce this bill by request, as the saying is, of certain respectable citizens of this city. I have not had time to examine the bill; but assuming that it is proper in its form, I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present also a memorial of clergymen of South
Washington and others on the subject of this bill. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sionx Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LABOR IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following resolution: which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved. That there be printed and bound of the special report on Labor in Europe and America, (Executive Document No. 21.) three hundred copies; one hundred for the Senate and two hundred for the Department of State, to supply legations and consulates in foreign countries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORTON. If there be no further morning business, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The first section provides that the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at the hour of one o'clock, on the last Wednesday in January next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and the tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a striicient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. If, upon the reading of any certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and the question shall be submitted to the body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit the question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be re jected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately re-assemble, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

The second section provides that if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

By the third section it is provided that when the two Houses sep arate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or for the decision of any other question pertinent thereto, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate has lasted two hours, it shall be in the power of a majority of each House to direct that the main question shall be put without further debate.

Section 4 declares that at such joint meeting of the two Houses, seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. The joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have clared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana, who has heretofore considered this subject with a good deal of care, whether this bill differs, and if so in what respect, from the measure which passed the Senate at the last session?

Mr. MORTON. There are some verbal alterations, but it is substantially the same bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Nothing affecting the substance is changed?
Mr. MORTON. Nothing affecting the substantial features of the bill

Mr. MORTON. Nothing affecting the substantial features of the bill which the Senate passed last year.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am very glad that, even at this stage of the session, this very important question has come up for the consideration of the Senate. The Senate may remember that many weeks ago I urged speedy action on the subject, and I suggested methods of action which I believed then and still believe were the best calculated to insure accounting after the two Houses of Congress. lated to insure co-operative action between the two Houses of Congress upon this subject. The power of each House is the same over this subject, the same measure being committed by the Constitution to each; and therefore it was that I believed the present condition of party majority in each House was exceedingly favorable to the framing of such a permanent rule in the shape of law upon this subject as would be satisfactory to the American people. Although the Sen-ate has not seen fit to adopt my suggestion that this subject should be considered by the two Committees on Rules or the two Committees on Elections in the Houses respectively, and that in that way a measure could be made more probable of acceptance by each simply by being reported by each committee to its own House favorably, still am most anxious to see something done in the proper direction upon this subject, and if this bill shall be a step in that way I am prepared to give it my support.

I have felt long that which I apprehend the honorable Senator from Indiana has felt, some degree of embarrassment in regard to the measure of power committed to Congress over the counting, accepting or rejecting of the electoral votes of the electors of the various States. The letter of the Constitution on this subject is very meager. In the second article of the original Constitution it was provided that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress;" and then proceeds to exclude Senators or Representatives or persons holding an office of trust or profit from the office of elector. Then follows in the original Constitution a provision for the meeting of the electors which has been superseded and annulled by the twelfth amendment of the Constitution. Then follows a paragraph authorizing Congress in its discretion to determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, and declaring that that day shall be the same day throughout the United States.

The twelfth article of amendments, superseding a portion of the third paragraph of the second article, provided that-

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit scaled to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

This latter clause contains all the power that is delegated to the two Houses of Congress or to any other officer of the Government in respect to the counting of the electoral vote; and the present bill provides simply the legislative machinery to accomplish this result. There has been argument heretofore before Congress, which I have concurred in, to the effect that the two Houses are mere witnesses to the counting of these votes. The only officer named is the Presiding Officer of the Senate, into whose custody the certificates shall have been delivered in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution by the electors or their agents, their messengers, and those certificates being in his hands are to be opened by him and the votes are then to be counted; by whom, is simply a matter of inference, perhaps of necessary inference; but they are to be counted. The powers given to Congress are enumerated, and a just and wholesome construction will cause the expression of one power over a subject to exclude other powers not expressed. is given to each State to appoint through its Legislature, or in such manner as the Legislature may provide, a number of electors. Congress is given the power to determine the time of choosing them, and the day on which they shall east their votes; and then the two Houses are made the witnesses of the opening of the certificates by the presiding officer; and this enumerates all the express powers; and the question for the Senate and for each member to determine is how far this expression of powers excludes others not expressed.

For the last three presidential elections, the vote for President and Vice-President has been counted under the alleged authority of a joint rule, which at the end of eleven years the Senate have rescinded by their own action, which as yet has not been concurred in by the other House, whether any concurrence be necessary or not. I have heretofore stated that in my opinion the concurrence of the House was not essential. But under that rule the electoral votes in three presidential elections have been counted; under a rule that gave the presidential elections have been counted; under a rule that gave the power of absolute veto to either House, and that was given in separate session and without an opportunity of debate, with the barest statement of an objection which might be on its face the merest pretext for the assumption of a power to exclude the vote of any State, and disfranchise any State at the caprice, the unargued or unreasoning will of either House of Congress. It is not too much to say that such a power was an utter usurpation, utterly without warrant in the Constitution, dangerous in the extreme, and threatening to overthrow that spirit of popular government which all over underlies the frame-work of our system, because it enabled, on account of a disagreement in regard to a vote, the entire electoral vote of a State, any porment in regard to a vote, the entire electoral vote of a State, any portion of the electoral vote of a State, or the electoral votes of any number of States, to be cast out by the silent operation of a veto by the vote of the Senate or of the House. It gave to either House the power to disregard and overthrow the expression of the popular will, and consign the election to that one body to which only in the event of the failure of the people by a majority vote of all the electors to express their will has the Constitution relegated the question. In that event the decision which the people had failed to make themselves the Constitution remits to the popular branch of Congress, the House of Representatives.

This state of things has continued for three elections. Thrice have the people of this country voted with a power that was foreordained in case of necessity to thwart their election, given to either House of Congress, the right under any pretext in silence and without reason, without debate, to overthrow the result of the popular election. But the present bill abrogates that monstrous claim of power; and I will not say that the monstroity of that claim was discovered only when a variance occurred under a popular election between the majorities of the two Houses; but such is the fact, that for three presidential terms, the last term of Mr. Lincolu and both terms of the present President, and until there was a change in the majority of the popular branch of Congress, this rule with all its unhallowed and dangerous and despotic power stood unquestioned and unassailed.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me I will call his attention to the fact that, so far as I am concerned, I proposed a change in this rule before this change in the House of Representatives. I think for three years I have been calling the attention of the Senate to the twenty-second joint rule and urging that it ought to be abolished or modified.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to deny anything that the honorable Senator says in regard to his action; but I simply say, having been a member of the Senate for seven years, that until the last year and the last session I had no knowledge, and I do not think the records of the Senate betray any debate upon the subject in the line of reformation of that rule. If there had been any, there would have been no difficulty whatever in the passage of some remedy. The Senate had no trouble in passing this act at the last session, or one, as I understand, from the Senator almost precisely similar, and it could readily, in the then condition of the House of Representatives, have become the law of the land.

become the law of the land.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. While I have nothing to say in regard to the opinions that may have been entertained in the Senate, it is within my personal knowledge that immediately after the votes were counted in the month of February, 1869, a debate took place in the House of Representatives, where I then had a seat; and the provisions of that rule were generally condemned, I think uniformly condemned, by those who took part in the debate and who were then members of the majority party in the House. No action was taken tending to secure the repeal of the joint rule, for it was late in the session and late in the Congress; but at that time there was a very decided opinion that the rule was a bad one.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very glad, then, to hear that there was a de-Senate in the House of Representatives; but I am also aware, as the Senate and the country are, that that debate was followed by no action and by no amendment of the rule. However, I merely cited this more historically than for any other fact. I am glad that a remedy or a proposed remedy comes now.

Now it is proposed, however, after the very sensible and I think authorized machinery of tellers merely to tabulate this vote and return it to the two Houses, that "no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses." That is far safer, that is far better; and I do not know that I am prepared to offer any tribunal better adapted than the two Houses for a co-operative vote, which is made necessary before the electoral certificate of a State shall be rejected; and yet my want of suggestion comes from the silence of the Constitution itself on this subject. It has been suggested that the Supreme Court of the United States might take cogmizance of these grand questions of election upon which the Chief Magistracy of the Union and the Vice-Presidency also depend. And there will be found, I think, in the mind of every one who considers this question, a hesitancy for want of the power of the two Houses of Congress to provide, as once they did, for giving to each House the power of rejection and now to constitute the two Houses the tribunal which shall decide upon the reception or the rejection of the vote of a State. This bill undoubtedly does place this power in the hands of the two Houses, formerly confined to either one, of disfranchising at any time an entire community; that is to say, the community of an entire State or of any number of States. The answer is very plain, that, where the two Houses shall be of a different political complexion, both will not join to defeat a popular choice, because the Senate would not wish to throw the election into the hands of the House, as it necessarily must do, if there be not a majority of electoral votes declared by the count; and the House undoubtedly, on the other hand, would not have it in its power to claim the election by the non-assent of a non-concurring body of a different political view. But it is a grave question whether the two Houses have the power to constitute themselves a tribunal for the acceptance or rejection of the vote of a State at will, and with the small amount of debate and time allowed by the subsequent sections of this bill, and thus by a concurrence of action assume and perhaps exercise the power of changing the prima facie result of a popular election, and throwing it under the control of one of the branches of Congress. That is the result; let us con-template it, and ask whether we have the power thus to do. In the event of a majority of the electors not having been found to cast their votes for any one candidate, the election must go to the House of Representatives. I can imagine the two Houses of the same political party, not as they are now constituted, for this is not a law for to-day only; it is to become a settled law, a fixed rule, requiring for its repeal the assent of a majority of each House and the President of the United States. We are to establish as our rule that a power is to be deposited in the hands of the Senate and the House of Representatives at their will to throw the election at all times into the House of Representatives by concurring in the rejection of the electoral votes of the various States. Is or is not that an authorized exercise of power? Is or is it not in accordance with the theory of our Government on this subject? Were the two Houses of Congress ever intended to become the judges of the electoral vote of the people of this country? Apparently by the Constitution their duties would seem to be of a ministerial character only. They were to They were to stand by and witness the counting, and their presence in that way as witnesses was supposed to be a security. Now you change this from a merely ministerial power into a judicial power of the very gravest and most important character. Is there a warrant for that in the Constitution of the United States? And if Congress has the right thus to create itself into a tribunal for this purpose or to create any other tribunal competent for this purpose, are the two Houses of Congress the best tribunal that we can devise and suggest? I state these questions without the preparation to answer them fully, and in regard to them not having that conclusive opinion that I would wish to have before my vote is to be cast on this subject; but I state them to exhibit to the Senate the gravity of the propositions contained in the present bill, and to ask them not hastily to adopt a measure of this kind.

Everything that tends to give certainty, everything that tends to promote fairness, everything that tends to create such a decision as shall satisfy the great popular mind of the country and give that respect to public action which every legislator ought to do his best to secure, I desire to favor. Give the people a tribunal entitled to respect, and its decisions they will abide by though they may be adverse to the popular will at the moment. Therefore it behooves us, in dealto the popular will at the moment. Therefore it behooves us, in dealing with a question which was intended to be left to popular election, not to interpose such a tribunal, and that tribunal to be created to-day by our own votes, as may thwart, and has certainly the power to thwart in a given case, the expression of the popular will at the polls. I hope this measure will be discussed. I am not prepared to say that I shall vote against this bill, nor have I proposed to raise my voice in opposition to it; but I trust that these suggestions thus thrown out, and rather unpremeditatedly-for I did not suppose the measure would be called before the Senate this morning—may meet with some response from others on this floor who have likewise given grave consideration to this subject.

grave consideration to this subject.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—
Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana, and before he discusses this bill, I arise to suggest an amendment in harmony with the general purpose of the bill.

The proviso of section 3, in my judgment, may possibly enable either House to defeat the object of the bill, the object of the bill as declared on the second page, in section 1, being to prevent either House from defeating the counting of the vote of any State, and to repeal the practice that had grown up under the twenty-second joint rule, by which either House might by its affirmative vote exclude any State by which either House might by its affirmative vote exclude any State for any cause whatever from having its electoral vote counted for President. That rule is sufficiently met by the language of the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, and thirty-first lines of the first section, as

And no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

But under the proviso to section 3, I fear very much that either House might by indirection defeat the counting of a vote, because it provides for the separation of the two Houses and the consideration by each House of the question, and then provides:

That after such debate has lasted two hours it shall be in the power of a majority of each House to direct that the main question shall be put without further debate.

This provision is not compulsory, and either House might prolong debate indefinitely, and thus prevent the question from being taken on the counting of the vote. It is true it is rather a violent supposition to suppose that either House of Congress would, by an abuse of its power, endanger the existence of the Government; but the object of this bill is to guard against all possibility of the abuse of power in that respect, and it is not an improbable supposition that in high party times, under great excitement, one House might thus neglect or refuse to direct the main question to be put. We know very well the influence of party excitement and party feeling, especially under strong provocation. Therefore it seems to me that this provision ought to be more peremptory in its character; it ought to require, ought to be more peremptory in its character; it ought to require, after two hours' debate, a peremptory putting of the main question. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana whether it would not be safer and more in harmony with the object of the bill to require after a reasonable time, say two hours, that the question should be put in each House and the convention again assembled. an amendment to make the provision read: "That after such debate has lasted two hours it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate." That, it seems to me, will avoid the difficulty, and then no question can be discussed longer than two hours. I think two hours ample time for the discussion of any question that may arise.

Mr. EATON. I was about to ask my friend from Ohio if, in his judgment, two hours' time would be sufficient to discuss the grave questions that might arise. I agree that his criticism is entirely just in regard to the clause in the bill. The only doubt in my mind is in regard to the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a duty rather in the nature of a ministerial duty, that must be promptly performed. The only question before the two Houses is as to the form and sufficiency of a return, and that depends on matters rather of a historical character. The facts connected with these returns will have been published to the world before the time when the two Houses meet, and probably the attention of each member of Congress will have been called to them. you allow more than two hours or open the subject for indefinite de-bate, you may defeat the object of the law. There is not much time allowed to elapse between the time of counting the votes of the electors and the time when the presidential office must commence, on the 4th of March. This bill antedates the time of counting the on the 4th of March. This bill antedates the time of counting the votes, making it two weeks, as I understand, earlier than it was before, in order to allow a reasonable time to dispose of any question which may arise. It seems to me that two hours' time is sufficient in a deliberative body to point out the real point or merit of any proposition likely to arise on a question of this kind, which is rather a matter of form than otherwise. Indeed I remember in the last case, which was a very important case, that the Senate hastily decided, I think warned on the hardeness votes to adopt was ellered. Figure 1. think wrongly, on the Arkansas vote; no debate was allowed. Senator went up to the desk and examined the paper, and without having time to look at the law, without having even time to send to the Library to see what the constitution of Arkansas required, we fell into the error of supposing a fact which did not exist, that the State of Arkansas had a seal, and therefore we rejected the vote of that State because of the want of a State seal to the certificate. Two hours' time is ample to decide any question of that kind or that is likely to arise in these cases. Indeed I thought it was rather longer than necessary. A short debate would be proper to call the atten-tion of each House to the matters before them, and then the voto should be taken peremptorily and mandatorily, in my judgment. I submit the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. In the same connection with the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio, and to save trouble to the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, I would call his attention to the second section, and inquire whether the point which I am about to mention was considered by the committee, and whether they designed the bill to have the effect that it seems to me it will have if it be adopted in its present form?

The provision in the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, and thirty-first lines of the first section gives practically a veto power to both Houses acting conjointly when an objection is made to a vote being counted; ing conjointly when an objection is made to a vote being conniced; but in regard to the contingency where different certificates of election are sent up from a State, the second section provides that, "all such returns shall be opened by him" (the President of the Senate) "in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes;" both the conflicting returns shall be opened.

And that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

It would therefore require the concurrent action of both Houses to fix upon the authentic return from such a State. Suppose these two Houses should differ; one should assert that one return was the correct one and the other the other; there seems to be no provision made for settling the difficulty that would thus arise. I would inquire if in the event such a thing should occur the vote of a State that was thus disputed would be cast out entirely? If so, it leaves it till in the research of the Heaves to the these than the state of the State.

it still in the power of either House to veto the vote of such a State.

Mr. WRIGHT. The suggestion just made by the Senator from Virginia had occurred to me, as also one or two others that I beg leave to submit to the chairman of the committee before he shall address

the Senate.

By the first section it is provided that no electoral vote of a State shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. That contemplates a case where there is but one return from a State. The second section contemplates a case of two returns; and that provides that the return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return. Now, suppose they shall not agree, then what is to be the result? That is a contingency that, it seems to me, is not provided for in this bill. That is one suggestion that I have to make; and it is the one already submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

I will suggest to the Senator from Indiana another trouble that occurs to me under the first section. The last clause of the first section contemplates that not only the question of the admission of the return from a State may be referred to the two Houses acting separately, but that other questions "pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner." If the "like manner" refers to what precedes, with reference to the manner of accepting or rejecting a return, and that in determining any of these other pertinent questions there must be an affirmative vote of the two Houses to reject, otherwise it shall be accepted; and if, upon a question thus pertinent being submitted to the two Houses, they do not affirmatively determine to reject it, it seems to me that you would get into difficulty. That is my second suggestion.

The third suggestion arises upon the fourth section of the bill.

That provides that:

No recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon.

The doubt that occurs to me is whether that recess relates to a recess by each House separately or a recess as to both Houses, and whether if one House-determines to take a recess that works a recess of both Houses or whether it only works a recess of such House as thus determines, or whether it is necessary that there shall be concurrent action determining in favor of a recess to have a recess of both Houses, or whether either House acting for itself can take a reces

I do not know but that the inquiries I make are entirely answered by the bill as it stands; but I suggest them as difficulties which have occurred to me, and I shall be glad to hear from the Senator from Indiana upon them.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, the objection which has been so well stated by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Virginia had occurred to me, but I thought I would not mention it until the matter had been arranged in regard to the amondment of the Senator from Ohio. It seems to me that this second section is altogether vicious.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Now, suppose they do not decide. Suppose the Senate acting separately decides that return marked "A" is the true return and the House of Representatives decides that the return marked "B" is the true return. Then neither can be counted by the terms of this bill. Manifestly this cannot be the design of the distinguished Senator from Indiana. Although perhaps it is a little out of place now, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, if the Senator from Indiana will have the kindness to look at the second section of the bill—I will read the last paragraph:

And that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Now, I will suppose there are two returns which I will designate for Now, I will suppose there are two returns which I will designate for the purpose of identification as one "A" and the other "B." The Senate decides that "A" is the proper return; the House of Representatives decides that the return marked "B" is the proper return from that State. Which is to be counted under this bill? Certainly neither. "That return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return." Manifestly the bill is vicious in this particular.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, before proceeding to comment on the features of this bill, I wish to answer a suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware to the effect that it was not proposed to repred

Senator from Delaware to the effect that it was not proposed to repeal or modify the twenty-second joint rule until after a change had oc-curred in the political relations of the House of Representatives. The effect of that suggestion was to give this proposed amendment a po-litical significance. Now to relieve myself at least from any imputa-tion of the kind, I call the attention of the Senate to a speech that I made in this body on the 17th day of January, 1873, three years ago and more, certainly before this charge had taken place in the political complexion of the House of Representatives. I discussed the twenty-second joint rule as it stood until a few weeks ago, and I cannot now add anything to the objections I then took to that rule, to its enormity, and to its danger, I said:

I now come to the consideration of the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses, adopted in 1865, in regard to the counting of the electoral vote. This rule was undoubtedly the result of a conviction in Congress of the necessity of providing some method for avoiding the dangers I have been discussing; but it was certainly adopted without much consideration, and with a view apparently of furnishing an additional safeguard against receiving electoral votes from States that had been in rebellion.

Again I said:

It is, in my judgment, the most dangerous contrivance to the peace of the nation that has ever been invented by Congress; a torpedo planted in the straits with which the ship of state may at some time come into fatal collision.

I then went on to recite the rule, and discussed it somewhat at length. It was at a time when both Houses of Congress were Republican. I did not discuss it in any political aspect. It was a question above party and political considerations, and as such I present it now. The principal change which this bill makes from the old twenty-second joint rule consists in three things, to which I will call the attention of the Senate. Under the twenty-second joint rule, when the two Houses assemble to count the electoral vote, if an objection be made, we will suppose to the vote of New Jersey, however technical and trifling it may be, the two Houses separate to vote on the objecjection, each in its own chamber. Unless the objection be overruled by the vote of both Houses, the vote of New Jersey is lost. For example, if the Senate sustain the objection and the House of Representatives overrule it, the vote of New Jersey goes out. If the House of Representatives sustains it and the Senate overrules it the vote of New Jersey goes out. Thus, it was in the power of one House of Con-gress to disfranchise a State and to disfranchise all the States; and under the operation of that rule, when the two Houses came to vote separately, there was no debate; there could not be a single suggestion. The Senate rejected the vote of Arkansas when we counted the votes the last time. Then, if there could have been a word said, we should have avoided that foolish blunder, for such it turned out to be; but under the rule there could not be a word said; we could not even refer to the constitution of Arkansas, and the result was that in twenty minutes we disfranchised about six hundred thousand people.

twenty minutes we disfranchised about six hundred thousand people. This bill allows a short debate to point out the objection or the fullity of the objection; and it provides that no State shall be disenfranchised or any electoral vote lost without the concurrent vote of both Houses. You cannot pass the most trifling bill without the concurrent vote of both Houses; you cannot appropriate a dollar of money without the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently, but made this all relations and distributed by the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently, but made this all relations and distributed by the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently that made this all relations and the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently that made this self-relation to the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently that made this concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently that the concurrent vote of both Houses, each acting septently that the concurrent vote of both Houses. arately; but under this old rule you could disfranchise forty millions of people by one House. It was absurd, wickedly and danger-ously unconstitutional. This bill provides that you cannot reject an electoral vote from any State unless both Houses shall concur in that rejection, and that is the only safe rule on the subject, in my judgment.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Do not the provisions of this bill allow of the increase of the votes of the electoral college by compelling the counting of any votes purporting to be electoral votes sent up from a State, no matter by whom; I want to show this effect: There are, say, in our electoral college at present 366 electoral votes; one-half of this is 183 votes, and 184 is a majority. The Constitution entitles the person having the greatest number of votes for President to be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; so that if any man shall be found to have received 184 votes he has a majority and he is entitled to be President. Now, if we shall permit two sets of returns to come from any State and require the concurrence of both Houses in order to reject either one of those two sets, we may, by one House refusing to concur with the other House in choosing which of these sets of duplicate returns shall be regarded as the lawful one, have the aggregate of the electoral votes increased; and say it occurs to the extent of 12 votes, we should then have 366, the true electoral college, increased to 378, and thereby we should make it necessary for a man to receive 190 instead of 184 to have a majority.

We are not making a law for this man's chance or that, or for this or that party, but proposing to make a permanent rule which shall be safe, satisfactory, just, and exclusive, so far as we can, of frauds or unfairness in elections; and the question is, would it be a wise thing to provide by this section 2—

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Let us construe that section by the language of section 1, from line 29 to 32:

And no electoral vote or votes from any State to the counting of which objections have been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

Here, then, should we not find that it would be within the power of some mischievous and unfair persons in different States of the country to cause certificates purporting, to use the language of this bill, to be certificates of electoral votes to come up, and thereby the aggregate of the electoral college to be swollen to such a figure that a majority would be required which in reality the present Constitution does not require? I ask the Senator if it does not strike him that there is force in that view?

Mr. MORTON. The first section of this bill applies to a case where

Mr. MORTON. The first section of this bill applies to a case where there is but one return from a State, and provides for settling objections which may be made to that return. The second section is intended to provide for a case where there are two sets of returns from the same State, as there were from Louisiana in 1872. Now, the question of the Senator from Delaware goes to this point, that where there are two sets of returns and the two Houses do not agree which set shall be counted, both sets will be counted and the aggregate number of electoral votes increased. That is not intended to be the effect of this section, and I think it is not. The effect of it is to determine which set shall be counted, and if the two Houses do not agree neither set is to be counted.

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes, and that return from such State—

I call the attention of the Senator now to this point-and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Does not that carry with it the negative, that if the two Houses do not agree, neither set shall be counted? Would it change the sense if you insert the word "only?" I have no objection to that being inserted, if it is desired, to make it certain.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, I suggest, the only point is this: the Senator says that the second section relates to cases where different certificates come up, and that the first section does not relate to such cases; that in the second section it requires a concurrent vote to have either passed, and in the first section it requires a concurrent vote to have one rejected. Therefore in the two classes of votes, where a single certificate comes up it requires the action of each House acting separately to reject, but where there comes, a duplicate certificate the result of the Senator's present construction of this bill is that either House by sticking to the certificate which it prefers can disfranchise the State as completely as was done under the twenty-second joint

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that the rule is exactly the reverse in the two sections, and of necessity. Where there is one set of returns, this bill provides that the vote of a State shall not be rejected unless both Houses agree to it; but where there are two sets of returns and the two Houses disagree, then who is to decide? I will suppose, as in the case of Louisiana, here are two packages sent to the Vice-President. He opens them, and finds that each one purports to be signed by the governor of Louisiana; that there are two sets of electors, each assuming to vote for President and Vice-President. Who is to decide which is the correct return, who is the governor of Louisiana, and which set of electors was entitled to cast the vote of that State? Will you leave it to the Vice-President alone? If you do not provide for settling it by the two Houses, he must decide that question. He is the absolute arbiter, and there is no appeal from his decision. Here are two sets placed in his hands. He may take a political view of the question, and he presents that set to the two Houses to be counted which he thinks ought to be counted, and there is no possible escape from it. You cannot even know what are the contents of the other package; you have no means of knowing. You leave him to decide what this bill provides that both Houses shall decide.

There is the precise danger to be avoided. If there are two sets of returns and there is no means by which the two Houses can pass upon them, who is to decide that question? We cannot read both sets; both cannot be counted, because the State can have but one vote or series of votes according to its population. Somebody must decide it. If the two Houses do not decide it, the President of the Senate must decide it, and that is just the authority which Mr. Mason assumed in 1857, when he refused to entertain a motion to reject the vote of Wisconsin. In that case the vote of Wisconsin was clearly illegal. It was not cast by the electors on the day fixed by law. A motion was made to reject the vote. That was before the adoption of any rule on the subject. Mr. Mason, then President pro tempore of the Senate, refused to entertain the motion, declared it out of order, directed the tellers to read the vote and to count it, and the vote of Wisconsin was counted, clearly in violation of the Constitution. As soon as that was done, the two Houses separated, and an angry debate took place in both Houses. The power of Mr. Mason was denied; but there was no rule on the subject, and it all came to nothing. Happily in that case the vote of Wisconsin was not important. Mr. Buchanan was elected by a large majority, even counting the vote of Wisconsin for Mr. Frémont. It became unimportant, as it would have been unimportant if we had had no rule on the subject three years ago and the Vice-President had determined that he would count this or that set of votes from Louisiana in 1873. But suppose that the election of President had turned upon it, we can then see the danger and the trouble to result from it. Where there is but one set of returns, it is right to provide that no vote shall be rejected unless by the concurrent vote of both Houses; but where there are two sets, somebody has got to choose between them. And who is it? Will you leave it to the President of the Senate? You cannot leave it to one House, because one House may choose one set and the other House choose the other set. You must trust to the judgment, you must trust to the integrity of Congress acting under the Constitution and under their oaths, just as you do in the passage of any bill on an important subject. You must believe something in the integrity of men, and in that case it is safer to leave it to both Houses than it is to leave it to one House alone. It is safer to leave it to both Houses than it is to leave it to the Presiding Officer of the Senate, because there is where the power must rest if it is not placed in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? Suppose that the Senate should use the remedy that the Constitution provides in the case of the election of President when it goes into the House, that the States by their representation shall settle this question when there shall be two returns, and that a vote by States be taken in the joint body. I would suggest such an amendment as

When the two Houses acting separately shall disagree in their decision as to which is the true and valid return from any State, or as to any other question which they may have separated to decide, the joint meeting shall finally determine the same by a vote by States, the representation from each State, including the Senators therefrom, having one vote; but if such representation shall be equally divided, the vote of such State shall not be counted.

This I have drawn hastily, and it is a mere suggestion thrown out. It seems to me it would solve this difficulty. There are two returns from a State; we are in joint convention; the States themselves by their votes could settle the question, the representation from each State having a single vote. It is a mere suggestion, which I throw out for what it is worth.

Mr. MORTON. As between the method provided in this bill and leaving it to the votes of the States, I should much prefer this as being the most democratic and as being the fairest in every point of view. I think the weakest part of our Constitution to-day is that part which provides for the election of President by the States each

Mr. MORTON. As between the method provided in this bill and leaving it to the votes of the States, I should much prefer this as being the most democratic and as being the fairest in every point of view. I think the weakest part of our Constitution to-day is that part which provides for the election of President by the States, each State having one vote; the smallest State in the Union having the same voice in the election of President as the largest one. That experiment has been tried twice; twice it endangered the existence of the Government; and it is to be sincerely hoped that it will never be tried again. The remedy of electing by the States was the last provision put in the Constitution of the United States after the convention had tried in various ways to settle the question. It was put there finally with but little consideration. It is unjust to the people; it is dangerous; it presents the greatest temptation for corruption that can possibly be presented.

But I was discussing the question in regard to two sets of electors in a State, where two sets of votes come here where there are two

But I was discussing the question in regard to two sets of electors in a State, where two sets of votes come here where there are two persons each claiming to act as the governor of the State, two bodies of men claiming to be electors. Two packages come here. Somebody must settle that question; and how shall it be done the most safely to the country and the most satisfactorily? Unless you provide for settling it in this way you must leave it to be settled by the presiding officer of the Senate. In my judgment it would be more conducive to the peace and safety of this country to provide for settling it by the action of the two Houses of Congress, just as you make the important laws and carry on the business of this country. You cannot leave it to one House alone. They do not agree; you cannot read both sets; you can only read one set, and therefore read that set which both Houses of Congress, supposing men to be patriotic and to be honest and acting under the obligations of the Constitution and their oaths, shall decide to be the true and valid return. I think that is the fairest way.

Mr. EATON. Suppose they do not agree on the same return, what

Mr. MORTON. The vote goes out, the State has no vote, because unless there is some tribunal to settle which vote shall be counted you cannot count both, and therefore you cannot count either. You must have some tribunal to settle that difficulty; and what tribunal is safer than the two Houses of Congress, I ask my friend from Connecticut?

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest that it would be better that some tribunal should be provided for settling this question of duplicate returns, which is not provided for in the bill at all. If the bill is passed in its present form, it will be in the power of a small faction or a large one in any State which wished to deprive that State of its voice in the electoral college, to send up a set of returns claiming to be the electoral returns, and if there was anything like strong partisan feeling in the Houses and they were divided politically, each party having a majority in one House, the effect of such returns would be to deprive that State of its vote. It might be engineered solely for the purpose of producing that result. It seems to me the bill would be in better form if some arbiter were provided to decide what should be the return from the State in that case.

be the return from the State in that case.

Mr. MORTON. In the case suggested by the Senator from Virginia, where a faction gets up another set of returns of electoral votes for the purpose of depriving a State of its vote, something must be left to the integrity and judgment of Congress. Take that very case where a faction works up a false set of returns, and they are sent to the President of the Senate. If you do not provide for the two Houses settling that question, you necessarily leave him to pick out the package that he thinks ought to be counted. He is as liable to be swayed by political considerations as both Houses are, or as either House is, and therefore the same difficulty returns. Now in regard to another tribunal, I presume my friend refers to a court or something of that sort to decide. That under the Constitution cannot be done, as will be seen when we come to consider its phraseology:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distincts lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

The certificates are to come to the President of the Senate sealed. Nobody knows the contents of them. Whether the electors have been certified to by the governor as elected, whether they have voted for persons living in different States for President or Vice-President, as required by the Constitution, or whether they have voted by ballot as required by the Constitution, none of these facts can be known until the two Houses assemble to count the votes, because the packages are not to be opened except in the presence of the two Houses at the precise time when the votes are to be counted. You cannot examine in advance and see if there are any irregularities and have them corrected, or submit them to a court to decide questions. These questions cannot arise until the two Houses have assembled to count the votes, and then the packages are opened for the first time.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Then and there. You cannot refer to any other tribunal; you cannot get the case before the Supreme Court of the United States or before any special court to be created for that purpose. These votes are then to be opened, and then and there they are to be counted. I will read on:

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the last of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately.

It contemplates, and the history of the debates shows that the Constitution contemplates, that when the votes have thus been opened and counted, if no person is found to be elected, the House of Representatives shall without adjournment proceed to elect a President, so that there shall be no interregnum—that there shall be no delay in the choice of an Executive of the United States.

Mr. WITHERS. The view which is stated by the Senator from Indiana in regard to the necessity of an immediate counting of the votes is undoubtedly correct; and so as to the inability of remanding the decision of the question to the Supreme Court; but I am not prepared at this time to give my assent to the doctrine that the two Houses would be better prepared or qualified in any sense to decide this question than would the joint representation of the States, acting by States, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania; or even than the Vice-President of the United States, because we all know that where responsibility is devolved specifically upon an individual occupying a position as high as the Vice-President occupies he will proceed to the discharge of that duty with a fuller knowledge of that responsibility, and, I think, with less probability of having his judgment warped by purely partisan considerations than would either House of Congress. But I have merely thrown out these suggestions not that I am prepared now to offer an amendment which would meet the difficulty I have suggested, but to call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee to it, and elicit such information with regard to arguments and reasons which caused the committee to report the bill in its present form rather than to propose a remedy for them.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to sections 1 and 2. It occurs to me that section 1 is predicated on the principle of law that, where a certificate is presented, all presumptions are in favor of that certificate being regular. Hence, according to law, that presumption remains unless it is set aside by the joint action of both Houses. If the Houses disagree, the presumption remains; and therefore you count the vote of the State. I can understand that to be the doctrine, and I think that follows rightly. But when we come to the second section, there is trouble in my mind; and all I want is to get the thing right. Where two sets of certificates are presented, and the Houses disagree as to which is the right certificate, what are you going to do about it? Certainly one or the other is right, because the State has certainly voted. If the two Houses differ, then, according to this bill, the vote of that State falls. There is the trouble in my mind. Can there not be some means devised whereby a sovereign State will have a right to have her vote counted and not be cut out of that vote by reason of the failure, or, if you please, the fraud of the certifying officers in sending up the wrong certificate? Is there not some way of getting at that and counting the vote? I can readily see that if the President of the Senate were the arbiter or umpire between the two Houses when the two Houses disagree, that umpire, as in many other cases, would settle the question; but where the Houses disagree and there is not an umpire to settle the question, the inevitable result will be that a State is deprived of its vote in the electoral college. I would like to hear from the Senator if there could not be some means devised by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to save the right of such State to vote?

Mr. MORTON. I think the bill is intended for that. To come right back to the point, where there are two sets of electors, two persons purporting to act as governor, and two seals each purporting to be the seal of the State, and when, as in the case of Louisiana, they are precisely alike so that nobody can tell the difference between them, when such a contingency occurs somebody must decide; and the only question is what is the safest tribunal. Is it safer to leave it to one man, however high his character and his ability may be, as the Vice-President, or is it safer and more in harmony with our institutions to leave it to the two Houses of Congress?

tutions to leave it to the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will pardon me; the point was, where the two Houses disagree, one House votes in favor of one certificate, and the other House in favor of the other certificate. In that case, if I understood the Senator correctly, the vote of the State falls; and it was to get over that difficulty that I asked him if a remedy could not be devised.

Mr. MORTON. Where there are two sets of votes and the Houses disagree they must both fall, unless you go to some other tribunal. Who can decide that question? What other tribunal can decide the question? You cannot have it decided by a court, for that would be clearly in violation of the Constitution. If the two Houses disagree, supposing of course that they are acting honestly and patriotically, who shall settle that question?

Mr. MAXEY. Is not the spirit of the Constitution in that case like a case here in the Senate? When the Senate divides equally, the Vice-President as President of the Senate, who ordinarily has no vote at all, gives the casting vote. Here you have the two bodies divided; one favors one certificate, the other the other. The State has to lose its vote altogether or leave it to some umpire. I ask would it not be within the spirit of the Constitution to let the Vice-President decide?

Mr. MORTON. If, when the Senate comes to decide the question which is the correct return, there is a tie vote in the Senate, and the Vice-President is presiding, not a President pro tempore, he can east a vote in that case, deciding the question in the Senate; but there is no provision in our Constitution authorizing the Vice-President or any other officer of Government to come in and settle the question where the two Houses disagree. If there is a tie vote in the Senate, the Vice-President can cast the deciding vote; but it is not in conformity with the spirit of our Constitution to provide for some officer who shall settle between the two Houses when they disagree. Therefore it seems to me that this provision is a matter of necessity. You have got to leave this disputed question somewhere, and is it not safer, is it not more democratic, more republican, to leave it to the two Houses than to any single officer? You cannot take it into a court; that is clear.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator is correct if the two Houses can agree; but what I am trying to reach is where the two Houses disagree, how are you going to save the right of a sovereign State? We ought to do that if we can.

do that if we can.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I cannot assume that I entertain the same opinion of the wisdom of this measure that is entertained by the honorable chairman of the committee, nor do I anticipate that if adopted it will prove efficacious in that moment of imminent peril when it is expected to be operative and to guard the interests of the country. We have gone on nearly a century without legislation. For three presidential periods we had a joint rule, a very bad one, for it augmented our difficulties rather than diminished them, and increased the apprehension which careful and judicious men naturally entertained concerning the possibilities of danger to the Republic in passing through the great crises of its existence.

In the examination which I have given to the provisions of the Constitution relating to the election of President and Vice-President, I have become more and more convinced, as my reflection and examination have been extended, that not only did the framers of the Constitution do all that was possible in order to secure safety in the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, but that in fact they did substantially all that was necessary. I do not accept the suggestion that the Vice-President of the United States has anything more to do in the business of counting the votes for President and Vice-President than that specific duty which is prescribed for and enjoined upon him by the Constitution. That duty is, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives to open the cer-There being no other duty assigned to him, I infer naturally that he is to do nothing more.

Almost always, I think, when the subject has been discussed, the question has been presented whether Congress is to count the votes; and by Congress I mean the two Houses met in convention, according to the terms of the Constitution. Our best answer to that is the fact that from the first convention that assembled until the last, the two Houses in convention always did count the votes. A teller was appointed by the Senate, two tellers by the House. The votes, or certificates, or returns, whatever they are called, were handed by the Vice-President, after he had opened them, to the tellers. The tellers were the organs, the instruments, the hands of the respective Houses. The votes were counted by the tellers, and being counted by the tellers, they were counted by the two Houses; and therefore there never has been any difference of practice, and no different practice could have arisen under the Constitution. The two Houses in convention have from the first until now counted the votes.

I agree entirely with the suggestion made by the honorable chairman of the committee in regard to the power to count the votes and the duty to count the votes. The power was conferred upon Congress and the duty was enjoined upon Congress. The power and the duty are in Congress. Congress must exercise the power and perform the duty, and it is not possible under the Constitution to transfer it. If that be so, then the suggestion of the Senators from Virginia and Texas is answered, whether some device may not be resorted to by which there can be an arbitration and a judgment when a case shall arise such as is provided for in the second section of the bill. There can be, under the Constitution, no tribunal to decide that or any other question arising in the course of counting the votes; the duty is imposed upon the two Houses of Congress. They alone can perform it, and they have not the power to transfer its performance to anybody else. Whether this power is there for weal or for wee, there it is; and until the Constitution is altered there it must remain.

I say I have not the faith in the wisdom of this measure that is probably entertained by the honorable chairman of the committee; and yet I expect to vote for the bill. I have not the faith in it because I do not see the constitutional force that can be given to this bill, so that when it becomes a law it will be imperatively operative upon the two Houses of Congress that may assemble under it. understand that a joint rule adopted by each Congress would be operative upon that Congress that might be called upon to count the votes in a particular case, not only in good conscience, but in such a general judgment of the whole country that we may say, speaking in the ordinary use of language, it would not be possible for either House to violate the obligation imposed upon it by the joint rule and receive any support from any party in the country; but I think a law would have somewhat less force upon a Congress or upon one branch of a Congress that might find it convenient not to obey the law.

Here is a duty imposed upon Congress by the Constitution; it is a duty to be exercised at stated periods. The provision of the Constitution does not operate upon every Congress, but it operates upon particular Congresses. Can a Congress to which or upon which the provision of the Constitution does not attach at all legislate and bind the conscience and the judgment of a Congress that is to perform a duty imposed by the Constitution especially upon itself? I have great doubt upon the point, whether, if the exigency should arise when it would be thought desirable, so desirable as to be expedient, for one branch or the other of Congress to disregard the law, (and that would be just the exigency when probably the law should be observed,) we should not find one body or the other willing to take the responsibility and, upon the argument that could be presented, to go to the country for justification. Nevertheless it is true that, if we can devise a wise and just system, a system in harmony with the practice of the country and the judgment of men as to the constitutional provision, its enactment into law—such is the respect of the American people for law—would do something to secure the country against the evils that might otherwise arise; and therefore I am disposed to vote for the bill substantially as it is presented to us; and yet without feeling absolutely secure that it so rests in the power of Congress under the Constitution that a Congress called upon to observe it might not feel authorized to disregard it.
Still further, Mr. President, I think the counting of the votes, in the language of the Constitution, means something more than a mere examination of the certificates returned from the electors of the respective States. There are several precedents, I think, which go to show that our predecessors have also entertained that opinion. But it must, in the nature of the case, mean something more. Under the first secin the nature of the case, mean something more. Under the first section of this bill the votes are to be counted unless the two Houses concur in the rejection of them. The reason for this, it seems to me, is plain. The presentation of a single certificate in the usual form is prima facie evidence of the truth of what the certificate contains, and there being no testimony controverting that prima facie case, it certainly ought to stand until it is overruled by the concurrent judgment of the two branches of Congress authorized to pass upon the question. But when two certificates are returned from the same State, it cannot be said that there is a prima facie case for either of these certificates. be said that there is a prima facie case for either of these certificates, and with less reason can it be said that there is a prima facie case for both of these conflicting certificates, and therefore there is not a prima facie case for anything.

Two consequences follow from this state of things: First, that the counting of the votes under the Constitution means something more than the mere examination of the paper certificate; otherwise more than the mere examination of the paper certificate; otherwise there would be no possible means by which Congress, when there were two certificates returned from a given State, would have the power of ascertaining what the truth is. Hence, in the very nature of the case, there is power under the Constitution, vested in the two Houses of Congress, if the occasion demands it, to go behind the certificate and inquire into the facts; and that is a general power lodged in all tribunals and assemblies of men where there is authorities ascertain the truth in warmed to a plactice. ity to ascertain the truth in regard to an election. Secondly, it follows that neither of these certificates can be accepted and a result deduced from it unless the two Houses concur in accepting that certificate; and from that a third conclusion necessarily results, that if, unfortunately, through accident or intrigue or the machinations of persons hostile to the true interests of the country, two returns come in from a given State, and it is not in the power of anybody to demonstrate to the two Houses which is the true return, that State must lose That is what happens in all cases where the truth cannot be ascertained; some one suffers as a consequence of that inability, and no scheme that we can devise will rid us of that difficulty.

We must rely upon the integrity and intelligence of the people first, secondly upon the electors and representatives of the people in the respective States, and at last, notwithstanding the divisions of opinion upon party questions, notwithstanding the diversity of interests, notwithstanding the clash and the hostility of diverse purposes among men, we have in the end to rely much upon the integrity of the tribunals constituted by the Constitution to pass upon great questions involving the integrity and the countinuance of the Government itself. All governments are exposed to danger. Not yet has human wisdom devised a government free from danger. The machinations of men hostile to the perpetuity of a government always create apprehensions, and when by constitutional provisions you have set up every safeguard and interposed every check which human wisdom or human ingenuity can devise, there still remains the element of danger in ingenuity can devise, there sein remains the element of danger in unmeasured quantity.

The people of this country have confided something to Congress, and this is one of the powers confided to Congress, a solemn duty resting upon it. We have, with all the confidence we can command, to believe that each succeeding Congress when called upon to act in this critical period of national life will do its duty.

The this will be case as I am able to present it. I am disposed to

In this view of the case as I am able to present it, I am disposed to vote for the bill; and yet I am not sure but that the Constitution, interpreted in its natural sense and in the light of the usage of the country for nearly a century, would after all be as good security for the peace and the continuance of the Government as any measure we can devise

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is no new subject to me. Soon after the count of votes at the last presidential election I took occasion to say in the Senate that in my judgment unless something were devised to obviate the danger to the country that might grow out of the count of the vote for President, we might find the country plunged into civil war upon the question who has been elected President of the United States. That count was calculated to make every one reflect, to make every one feel how dangerous is our situation. We saw more than one State deprived of its electoral vote on that count where the two Houses were divided in opinion; we saw States lose their vote entirely; and fortunate it was for the country that the rejection of those States did not change the result. If the case had been that the votes of those States, if counted, would have changed the result, it is almost too much to expect of human nature that that count would have been peaceably acquiesced in. Very soon after that, or I believe at the beginning of the next session, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morron] introduced a resolution and spoke upon it, referring this subject, if I recollect aright, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a report.

ileges and Elections for a report.

Mr. MORTON. It was three weeks before that count.

Mr. THURMAN. Before that count; perhaps it was. The Senator spoke somewhat elaborately upon it. The subject was referred to the committee and a bill was reported by that committee. Glancing over this bill, I find it to be substantially the bill that was reported then. I do not know what changes have been made in it particularly; but I do not discover, on a hasty reading of this bill, any material changes that have been made.

Now, sir, I wish to say that for the second section of this bill, to which exception has been taken. I must assume a portion of the re-which exception has been taken, I must assume a portion of the responsibility, for I believe that it was upon my suggestion that the Senator from Indiana introduced this second section into the draught of his bill. I ask my friends to consider what this bill would be if the second section were stricken out. We all agree, I think I am right in saying, that the duty of the President of the Senate is simply minin saying, that the duty of the President of the Senate is simply ministerial; that he is not constituted the judge to decide whether a return is valid or not. The whole history of the country, I think, is against any such interpretation of the Constitution as would confer on him that power; and the fact that more than once the Vice-President who presided over the joint convention was himself a candidate either for the office of President or Vice-President would seem to be quite sufficient to show that it never was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, or of the people who adopted it, that this great power of judging of elections should be decided by one man and he a candidate.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to refer to that?
Mr. THURMAN. I will thank the Senator.
Mr. MORTON. In the remarks I made in 1873, and to which I have before referred, I made this statement:

have before referred, I made this statement:

Upon the hypothesis that the President of the Senate has the power to open and count the electoral votes, and that the two Houses are to be present merely as witnesses, and have no jurisdiction over the subject either jointly or separately, everybody must perceive that it is a vast and dangerous power to repose in the hands of one man, especially when he may be ardently devoted to the fortunes of a great party, or when he may be personally interested sitting as a judge in his own case; for it has happened six times in the history of our Government that the President of the Senate has opened and counted the votes for himself, either for President or Vice-President. In 1797, John Adams, as Vice-President, opened the votes for himself, and declared himself elected President. In 1801 Jefferson, as President of the Senate, opened and counted the votes for himself when he and Burr were the candidates for President. In 1821, Vice-President Tompkins, as President of the Senate, opened and counted the votes for himself, ebeing a candidate for reclection; and in 1837 Mr. Van Buren, then Vice-President, counted the votes for himself as President, opened and counted the wotes for himself, the being a candidate for reclection; and in 1837 Mr. Van Buren, then Vice-President, counted the votes for himself as President, opened and counted the votes for his re-election as against Mr. Tyler, the opposing candidate; and in 1861 Mr. Breckinridge, then President of the Senate, opened and counted the votes for himself as a candidate for the Presidency. of the Sena Presidency.

Mr. THURMAN. I am obliged to the Senator for recalling to our memories those facts.

Mr. EATON. May I be permitted to ask the Senator from Indiana from what he read?

Mr. MORTON. I read an extract from the speech that I made some three years ago.

Mr. EATON. I did not suppose myself that the Vice-President counted the votes at all.

Mr. THURMAN. That was exactly the conclusion I would have come to, that the counting is not by the Vice-President, and these facts show that it never could have been contemplated that he should be the judge of the election. What his duty is, is prescribed in the Constitution:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

There is no duty devolved upon him but to open the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. That is all the function that is devolved upon the President of the Senate, and that is all the duty he has to perform. We do not disagree about that. The votes then are to be counted. How are they to be counted? They have been counted by a sort of common understanding as to the mode of procedure. They were up to the time of the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule. But now that joint rule, it is held, has been abolished by the Senate receding from it, or by its falling at the end of a Congress. So, at least, I understand a majority of the Senate to hold. How, then, are the votes to be counted? In answer to what is said by the Senator from Massachusetts about a law being inoperative and some remarks that seemed to favor the regulation of this matter by rule, I have this fundamental principle to assert: that where a power is vested in any department of this Government, and the particular mode of exercising that power is not prescribed in the Constitution, that mode is to be prescribed by law. I never thought that a joint rule was the proper mode. I repeat, when a power is vested in any department of this Government and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed by the Constitution, the prescribing of that mode belongs to the law-making power, the Congress of the United States; and, therefore, in this case, where the Constitution simply says that these votes shall be counted, without prescribing in detail the mode of their count, it follows necessarily from the structure and genius of our Government, and from the very nature of legislative power, that that mode is to be prescribed by law. I never believed, therefore, that a joint rule was the proper mode. I believe that a law is the proper mode; and I believe that that law binds everybody, binds each House of Congress as much as any law binds until it is repealed. I have no difficulty therefore with this being a law. I think it proper that it should be in the shape of a bill to become a law.

Now, I ask my friends to consider what this bill would be if the second section were stricken out. The first section provides, in accordance with the Constitution, that the returns shall be opened and Iaid before the convention of the two Houses. If there be no objection to a return it is counted as a matter of course; but if there be an objection to a return, then the first section provides that the Senate shall retire, and each House shall consider the objection, and that return shall be counted unless both Houses concur in rejecting it; and if both Houses concur in rejecting it, then it is to be rejected; but if either House is in favor of counting it, it shall be counted. But suppose there are two returns from a State; the presiding officer, the President of the Senate, is the man who is to open the returns; he opens the return first which he sees fit to open, and it would not hap-pen one time in ten thousand that he would not know whose return that is; he would know whether that return was in favor of the candidate of his party, or whether it was a return in favor of the candidate of the other party. He then selects the return which is in favor of the candidate of his own party, and lays that before the joint convention of the two Houses. Objection is made; the Senate retires; one body votes for that return, and the other body votes against that return. Under the first section that return must be counted. Thus by that means you have put it completely in the power of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, by presenting one return before another, to cause that return which he first presents to be counted as the vote of

Mr. MAXEY. I do not think the Senator states it precisely as the second section reads.

Mr. THURMAN. I am speaking of the first section.

Mr. MAXEY. There is no objection to that so far as I know; but the question raised by the Senator from Ohio was as to the propriety of striking out the second section. I presume no one is in favor of striking that out entirely, but the second section reads that if there are two returns from the same State, both those returns shall be opened by the President of the Senate, not one submitted to be disposed of and then another, but both shall be opened. Now the query arises: One of the Houses is in favor of sustaining one of those returns, and the other is in favor of sustaining the other return; the Houses divide. There is no presumption in favor of those certificates, because they are of equal dignity. As the section now stands, the vote of that State falls, is not counted either way. The question which I have endeavored to raise is: Can there not be, by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, some means devised whereby the vote of the State in that case may be saved and counted in the selection of President and Vice-President? That is the point.

Mr. THURMAN. I am coming to that presently. I was endeavoring to show what would be the result if the second section were stricken out. If it were stricken out it would be absolutely in the power of the President of the Senate to determine, by presenting one return before another, which return should be counted as the vote of the State.

Then we all agree that the bill ought not to stand upon the first section alone, and that provision ought to be made for the case of two or more returns from a State. Is there any likelihood of such a case occurring which makes it necessary to legislate in respect to it? Yes, sir. We had two returns from Louisiana at the last election, and we had two returns from Arkansas at the last election; so that the case of two returns from a State is not simply a possible case, but it may be said sometimes to be a probable case; at all events it having oc-curred, it cannot be said that it is a far-fetched idea which need not be taken notice of by practical statesmen. It has occurred, and it may occur again.

Mr. KERNAN. Permit me to ask did the Vice-President produce both returns under the clause of the Constitution?

Mr. THURMAN. He did produce both.

Mr. KERNAN. And open both? Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. KERNAN. So that somebody had to decide which was the rue return?

Mr. THURMAN. He did open, according to my recollection, both from Louisiana, and both from Arkansas, and they were both rejected, if I recollect aright. Louisiana was I know.

Mr. MORTON. There was but one set from Arkansas.
Mr. THURMAN. There were thought to be two.
Mr. MORTON. There were supposed to be two at first; but there turned out to be only one.
Mr. THURMAN. There were certainly two from Louisiana. Then, in order to prevent the President of the Senate from forestalling judgment by simply presenting one of the returns, this second section requires him to present them all. There is no objection to that. Then comes the question, where there are two returns how are we to decide between them? We are to decide between them, as I suppose, according to the provisions of some law which we shall enact, which will enable us to come to a decision. This second section undoubtedly may have the effect if there be no amendment to it, and no remedy can be found, to cast out the vote of a State because the two Houses cannot agree which is the correct return.

Mr. BAYARD. That leaves a veto power to either House.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care by what name you choose to call it; that is the result. I suppose that in any other case that should come up for decision before any tribunal, if there were a question which of two papers, for instance, was a valid paper, and which was a forgery, and the court was composed of equal numbers, and two of them should decide in favor of one paper, and two decide in favor of the other, both papers would be excluded. The only question, and the difficult one, is this: Is the Constitution so impotent that we cannot provide a remedy or a tribunal to decide where the two Houses disagree? As I have said, the mode is to be decided by law. It is submitted to the law-making power to provide the mode by which it shall be ascertained which is the true return; and I must say that I am not prepared just now to assert that we cannot provide some mode by which this difficulty, where there is this disagreement between the two Houses, may be decided.

Mr. EATON. Allow me to suggest that that is just the fault in my mind with the second section—that it does not provide a tribunal to decide; it dodges the question. It throws out possibly both returns and thus the State is disfranchised. I have my friend from turns, and thus the State is disfranchised. I hope my friend from Ohio will be able to find some tribunal which will determine the matter. I think I can suggest one by and by.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope those who have devoted some attention to this subject will be able to find some tribunal or some mode of deciding; and I am sure that I shall give my support to any constitutional mode that is reasonable and proper and just in itself by which this difficulty arising from a disagreement between the two Houses can be decided.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. Every practicing lawyer knows that there is some-times a case omitted falling within the purview of the law and which ought to fall within the purview that is not discovered at the passage of the law, but it is discovered in practice. Here we do discover before the law is enacted that if this law is enacted as it now stands, there may be an important omitted case. It is to meet that II have been so persistent in this matter. I can readily perceive that a case may arise where two certificates will come from the same State. I can conceive that one House would adopt one certificate and the other House that one House would adopt one certificate and the other House the other; and, as the bill stands, the inevitable result would be that the vote of that State would not be counted. Now, can there not be—and I address that question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because it is their peculiar province—some mode devised whereby, in the event of a disagreement of the two Houses, the vote of the State can be counted, and that too in compliance with the Constitution? ance with the Constitution?

I will add that I believe, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, that this matter should not be left to a rule, but it should be done by a law which binds all, from the highest to the lowest, Congress and everybody else. Let us make a law which will provide for every contingency. This contingency which has been so persistently urged as being proper to be provided for is, in my humble judgment, of very great importance; and, as the matter is open, I would ask can there not be some means devised for counting the vote of a State in the event of a disagreement of the two Houses, as mentioned in the second section?

Mr. THURMAN. I have already stated, Mr. President, that I would not undertake to say that no mode could be provided, and I shall hail with joy any reasonable and constitutional mode that shall be proposed, for we ought by all means to avoid depriving any State of its vote. That is the first and most important thing, and just so far as we can go pursuant to the Constitution, just so far as we can provide for the contingency of two returns and of the two Houses disagreeing in respect to them, just so far as we can go to provide for the solution of that difficulty, just so far we ought to go within the limits of the

Now, sir, I am not prepared at this moment to suggest how this problem should be solved. It is full of difficulty. But in order to aid a little in solving it, I wish to say that it is not Congress in its legislative capacity that counts the votes; it is not Congress as a law-making power that counts the votes. Laws can be enacted by Congress only in pursuance of the Constitution, in the mode provided by the Constitution. When Congress acts upon these returns, it is not acting in the exercise of its law-making power; it is not acting under its legislative power. Congress can provide by law the mode of counting these votes. The only question is what limitations are there on our power to provide that mode.

I know it was suggested, and I think a proposition to that effect was offered at a previous session, that the votes should be counted in case of a disagreement between the two Houses by the Supreme Court. I for one must say that I hardly see how that could be done. The Supreme Court is a part of the judicial system of the United States. It is a distinct department, clothed with judicial power and no other powers; and I for one am not able to see how Congress can no other powers; and I for one am not able to see how Congress can devolve on the Supreme Court any powers that are not judicial. It has certain original jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Constitution. It is no part of that original jurisdiction to count the votes for President and Vice-President, or to decide any question relative to the election of President or Vice-President. Then what other jurisdiction has it? All the rest of its jurisdiction is appellate jurisdiction, such appellate jurisdiction as shall be conferred upon it by Congress. And now, what is meant by the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court? It is the jurisdiction by appeal from the decisions of inferior courts. It is not meant appeals from the decisions of the legislative department; much less is it meant appeals from the decisions of the legislative department or from the two Houses of Congress when they are assembled together to count the votes for Presidecisions of the legislative department or from the two Houses of Congress when they are assembled together to count the votes for President and Vice-President. I do not see, therefore, that you can confer this power upon the supreme judges as judges, sitting as a Supreme Court to decide this question, because it is not a judicial question within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. And to say that you could confer it upon them as nine individuals is the say that you can confer it upon any other nine individuals in the to say that you can confer it upon any other nine individuals in the United States.

I do not see, then, that we can get out of the dilemma by making the supreme judges the umpire between the two Houses of Congress. Then we shall give to the decision of one of the two Houses of Congress. Then we shall give to the decision of one of the two Houses of Congress a predominance over the decision of the other. I am afraid it will come to that. But if some one has the ingenuity to devise some other method, I shall hall it with great pleasure; and I hope the discussion may last upon this bill until some such mode can be found, if it exists, consistent with the Constitution. If it can be, I If it cannot be, I shall vote for the bill without it.

Mr. President, it is eminently proper that there

Mr. WHYTE. should be some act of Congress regulating the decent order of proceedings in counting and ascertaining and declaring the electoral vote of the States. Therefore I shall vote for a bill looking to that, and to that only. The bill presented by the Senator from Indiana, as the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, does cover that part of the case. There are other portions of his bill which in my judgment are thoroughly and entirely unconstitutional.

It was wise at the beginning of this session of Congress that the Senate of the United States should undertake the work of reform and annihilate a joint rule which was an enormity, a rule which passed this body almost without debate, which was not intelligently discussed at all or its defects properly pointed out. It passed through the Rotunda to the other side of the Capitol, and there at a night session, without debate, under a suspension of the rules, a rule of such a grave character as that received the votes of a majority of the Representatives of the people. That rule put it in the power of either House of Congress to defeat the will of the people expressed at the preceding presidential election. It was extraordinary in its character, and I was glad to see the Senate of the United States so soon repudiate it.

I differ with most of the Senators whom I have heard discuss this subject. The Senator from Indiana seems to have objection to the place where the privilege of counting and announcing the result of the electoral vote is now lodged, and he asks us, where is it safest to put it? I say put it where our fathers put it; put it where the Constitution puts it, and leave it there. It seems to me there can be no difficulty if we stand upon the provision which our fathers made for that case. It belongs to the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes. I differ with the Senator from Massachusetts when he speaks of the two Houses counting the electoral votes. I differ with Senators who doubt for a moment that our fathers meant to leave it in the power of the President of the Senate to open the certificates, to state the votes of the people of the States, and to declare what the people had determined should be in the future their will. I am surprised that we should stop here to-day to discuss the question whether we have a right by legal enactments to take away from the people that power put in the Constitution of the United States for their benefit merely authorizing the Vice-President of the United States to enunciate their will.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.
Mr. MORTON. Where there are two returns, each purporting to be the returns of a State, does the Senator hold that the Vice-President is authorized to select the return which shall be counted? Does he onstrue the Constitution in that way!

Mr. WHYTE. I do hold that the Vice-President of the United States is the proper person to state which vote shall be counted, because the Constitution has put it in his hands. I do say that, probably, except for the military interference, there never would have been any question as to what was the right return or the proper exhibit of the popular will in any of the States of this Union. Our fathers lodged the power with the people, in their Legislatures, in their States, to regulate the election of electors, and only left it to Congress to enunciate the voice of the people, the result of the action of the people in the several States. The Constitution puts the power in the President of the Senate in plain and unmistakable words. It is merely a ministerial duty. He has nothing more to do. It is his duty to open the certificates. The election has taken place in the November preceding. He knows who is governor of the State. The presumption is all of us know who is legal governor of the State. The law prescribes the mode in which the electoral colleges shall meet, in which they shall cast their votes, in which they shall make certificates and lists, and provides for the certificate of the governor of the State. bly, except for the military interference, there never would have been lists, and provides for the certificate of the governor of the State.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, the reading of the Constitution upon that point is this:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It does not say that the votes shall be counted by the President of the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. No; it did not mean to impose upon the President of the Senate the mere clerical duty of writing down the votes before him, as the Secretary of the Senate now does on every vote we cast here. It did not mean to impose upon him the clerical work of writing down the number of votes cast and making the calculation; but it did impose upon him the duty of making the actual count and aunouncing the result of the popular will. So, as I will show the Senator from Texas in a moment, Congress acted upon that theory when the first Congress met. Let us look at the question as stated in the Constitution:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives

That is all they have got to do with it. It is to be done in their presence, so that the eyes of the Representatives of the people in the House and the eyes of the representatives of the States in the Senate shall see that, as an American citizen, holding the high position of President of the Senate, he is discharging his duty faithfully before the people, that great duty confided to him, of opening the certificates and counting the votes and announcing the result of the action of the people in their several States.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Counted how? Under his direction, under his eye; calculated, I care not whether by the Secretary of the Senate or by the Clerk of the House of Representatives. That is all that the House of Representatives have to do; that is all that the Senate have to do; to be personally present and see the formality gone through with, in order that the Vice-President or the President of the Senate might not in his chamber or in his retiring-room open these certificates and announce to the world what the result had been. Say some Senators, the Vice-President has no power, and would you not rather trust the Senate or the House of Representatives than one man? No, Mr. President, not in performing a ministerial duty.

Mr. MORTON. I would ask my friend if choosing between two sets of votes is a ministerial duty?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; it is announcing what is the vote of the State; it is counting the vote of the State under the Constitution. Our fathers understood that to be the duty of the President of the Senate. It is no new idea of mine. Our fathers recognized the President of the Senate as the proper officer to count the votes of the electoral colleges, for when they sent the Constitution to Congress to be transmitted to the people of the States, what did they say? They had provided for a Vice-President in the Constitution to preside over this body. The Constitution made him the presiding officer of the Senate. Therefore who was to count the votes? Congress? Congress was here; Congress was elected; Congress was supposed to be in session. Then, if Congress counted the votes, there was no difficulty about it; but what did our fathers say when they transmitted this Constitution. tion to the States? They sent down with it over the signature of George Washington this direction to the Congress first assembled after the presidential election. After the other details it was resolved:

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

Our fathers trusted the President of the Senate. Our fathers told the first Senate that assembled, "in order to meet the provisions in regard to the President of the United States, you must have a President of your Senate." For what purpose? To receive the certificates, to open the certificates, and to stop there and leave it to Congress to count them? No, for receiving the certificates, for opening the certificates, and counting the votes for President of the United States. So it is to-day as it was under the first Congress that met after the adoption of the Constitution, and they have acted under it. Congress after Congress has acted under it; and this very twenty-second joint rule and the act proposed by the Senator from Indiana down to the words "two Houses" on the twenty-first line of the second page, with the exception of changing the date, is nothing more ner less than embodying the practice of Congress from the foundation of the Government down to 1865. It is nothing else than the practice that has preceded. They appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two tellers on the part of the House. These two made an actual manual count, and the President of the Senate announced to the two Houses and to the country what the result of that count was.

It would be a monstrous thing to say that either House or both Houses of Congress can defeat the will of the people of the States, with whom exclusively is lodged the power of electing a President and Vice-President through their electoral college. The Constitution in article second left with the people of the States the arrangement of their electoral vote:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

So that the whole power is in the people. The power is left with So that the whole power is in the people. The power is left with the people. Under the act of 1792, after they have sent here a certificate of their will from the States, all provided for regularly, these two Houses have nothing to do with it but to obey their will; and in order that that will may be properly ascertained the act of 1792 expressly provides the mode in which it shall be certified to Congress:

That the executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, to be delivered to the electors on or before the said first Wednesday in December, and the said electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes.

Then the act requires Congress to be in session:

On the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors; and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, and the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.

That is, by the President of the Senate, under the provisions of the Constitution. It was intended to leave it to the people, and it was intended that the Senate of the United States should have nothing to do with the election of President of the United States. I would rather vote for a bill leaving it to the House of Representatives to interfere than a bill which provided that the Senate should have anything to do with the election of President of the United States. We do not represent the people here. We represent the Legislatures of the States.

We represent the States themselves, the government of the States, and not the people in their primary sovereign capacity. House comes from the people. Every two years Representatives come to the other side of the Capitol to speak the voice of the people; and I would rather let the House of Representatives interfere than vote for any bill that permits the Senate to have part or lot in determining who shall or who shall not be President of the United States. The framers of the Constitution denied it to us. They denied it to us upon the very ground that we represented the States; that we were elected for the long term of six years; that we did not go back to the people often enough to be responsible to the people. Therefore, although when this clause of the Constitution was originally presented to the convention it left it to the Senate to elect a President and Vice-President of the United States in case of a failure on the part of the people to elect, the convention would not allow the Senate to have anything to do with it, and they struck out the Senate and put that clause in the Constitution which now remains, placing it in the power of the House of Representatives to elect where there is a failure on the part of the people, making them vote by States in order that some regard may be paid to the voice of the people of the States.

I said it was safer to leave a question of this character in the hands of one man than in the hands of many. Divide the responsibility, and it becomes so small, so infinitesimal, that scarcely any man feels it; but center it in one man of honesty and integrity, put him before the people liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, hold him accountable for speaking the voice and will of the people, and my word for it there is a greater protection to the body of the people than in a majority, which are often more tyrannical than any single man.

I shall vote for that part of the bill, if it can be so dissected and divided as will make a regular and orderly mode of procedure in the count and enunciation of the vote for President and Vice-President; but I will vote for no bill which takes away the power of announcing the vote, the power of counting the vote, the power of opening the returns, from that officer whom in my judgment our fathers desigreturns, from that officer whom in my judgment our fathers designated as the proper depositary for such power.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, as one of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I felt that the great difficulty in framing a bill and passing it into a law, to meet the troubles which we all feared might arise, would be found in meeting the question suggested by the provisions of the second section. As the debate this morning has developed, the same fear exists in the Senate and the same difficulty. It is conceded that difficulty may arise in the count of the votes giving proper expression to the will of the people expressed in the choice of electors for President and Vice-President. The Senator from Maryland has discussed with earnestness and ability the tor from Maryland has discussed with earnestness and ability the question which troubled some members of the Committee on Privi-leges and Elections, who I am sorry to say are not here to-day to par-ticipate in this debate and press those objections more fully before

I confess that I can see no objection to a law providing for the mode and manner of counting the vote. I desire by that law of course to-reach what is in fact the will of the people. Having been present at the reach what is in fact the will of the people. Having been present at the count of the votes of the last presidential election and witnessed the decision of the two Houses where there were two returns from one of the States, I could very well see and feel the danger which is liable to occur in the future. I do not suppose our fathers thought of that want of political integrity which would induce separate returns from a State or ever imagined that the people would be so lost to their includes to receive the state of the s rights as to permit such a thing to occur or that Congress would ever assume to itself the right to interfere within the limits of a State in settling that question for the people. The Constitution in providing for the election of a President and Vice-President evidently intended that it should be made by the people of the different States, acting through laws enacted by the States themselves, because it will be re-marked that the Constitution vests no power in Congress to provide either for the mode or the manner of choosing electors, but leaves that duty wholly to the Legislatures of the several States. The difficulty that has arisen, as was very truthfully said by the Senator from Maryland, has been caused by the interference of the military power of the Government of the United States in the intermilitary power of the Government of the United States in the internal affairs of the States and by placing persons in power and retaining them contrary to the will of the people. The framers of our Constitution imagined that the people of the States were capable of governing themselves; that they were capable of expressing their will at the ballot-box and inaugurating those as their rulers whom they may have thus chosen at the ballot-box, and scarcely imagined that the Federal Government would interfere to prevent them from that the Federal Government would interfere to prevent them from that the Federal Government would interfere to prevent them from thus installing the rulers of their choice. Consequently the Consti-tution left to them and to the Legislatures chosen by themselves the province of choosing electors to select the President and Vice-Presi-dent. Whatever may have been their intention, however, we must meet facts as they exist. We do know that the difficulty which the second section seeks to provide against has arisen and may arise in the future, and the great question to be determined it seems to me the future; and the great question to be determined, it seems to me, is, where shall we lodge the power of deciding in such an emergency what has been the expressed will of the people of a State who may by some abnormal condition in their political affairs send two returns to be counted purporting to be the vote of the electoral college of that State !

The bill as reported by the committee proposes to vest this power in the two Houses of Congress acting separately. It provides that they must concur before the President of the Senate or the proper officer shall be permitted to count either of the returns thus made. It seems to me that, if we would avoid a conflict where such a difficulty arises, it would be better to vest the choice of which is the proper return in somebody who will determine it and not leave it between the two Honses, which may be composed, as at present, of opposite politics, and which would be apt in that case to disagree and thus exclude the vote which would be apt in that case to disagree and thus exclude the vote of any State that might thus send two or more returns.

The suggestion was first intimated by the Senator from Pennsylvania and afterward by the Senator from Maryland that, as the Constitution has vested the House of Representatives, who are directly from the people, with the power to choose a President in default of an election by the people, it gives us the proper idea of what would be the safest body with which to intrust this power of choice in the event of a difference of opinion or of two returns coming from any one State. It strikes me to be more consistent with the theory of the Constitution of the United States that this power should be vested in that body thus pointed out by the Constitution to choose a President where the people themselves shall fail to make a choice than that it should be placed elsewhere. I therefore have prepared an amendment to the second section, which I offer for the consideration of the Senate, carrying out this view to vest in the House of Representatives, the Representatives of the people, the choice of the proper returns to be counted in the event that two or more returns are sent up. I move to strike out in the second section all after the word "which" in line 7 to the end of the section, as follows:

The two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

And in lieu thereof insert-

the House of Representatives, voting by States, in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

So that, if amended, the section will read:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States, in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it had always appeared to me that the provision of the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution, which declares that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and omits to say that he shall do anything more, was equivalent to the exclusion of the idea that any other duty was to be performed by him, and that the Constitution left it open as to who should count the votes otherwise than by stating that they should "then be counted." There is some force, however, in the resolution of the convention to which our attention has been called by the Senator from Maryland; and as we are making suggestions it has occurred to me that the second section might be amended by adding:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which is the true and valid return, then the President of the Senate shall determine which is the valid return.

I do not mean to say that, on deliberation, that is the best provision; but it is very clear from the amendments which have been offered that it is within the compass of our power to provide for that omission which exists in the bill. It is not likely that any vote will be taken on this bill to-day, and I have no doubt the reflection of the different Senators will provide the remedy which is sought for.

different Senators will provide the remedy which is sought for.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I listened with great attention to the able argument of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte;] and, as I had his permission to read a clause from the Constitution, I wish to state that it was with a view to the point suggested by the Senator from New Jersey:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates.

There is a positive, unequivocal duty devolving upon the President of the Senate. What is that duty? That duty is, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, to open all the certificates. Then what follows:

And the votes shall then be counted.

It does not say "by the Vice-President of the United States." My study of the Constitution has taught me that it is the most guarded and best-expressed instrument that I have ever read anywhere.

And the votes shall then be counted.

If it had been meant, as is contended, to devolve upon the President of the Senate the duty of counting the votes as well as the opening of the certificates, I ask why was not the clause so worded as to read thus?

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count the votes ?

It does not so read.

And the votes shall then be counted.

That is the way it reads, implying clearly, in my judgment, that it was the duty of the President of the Senate in determining who was elected President and Vice-President of the United States to open the votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that they should be witnesses to that great event; but there was another reason for that. It was that the House of Representatives, the direct Representatives of the people, and the Senators, the embassadors of the sovereign States, should be there; that when the expression was used, "and the votes shall then be counted," it was intended that the votes might be counted in the mode and manner which the embassadors of the States, constituting the Senate, and the Representatives of the people, constituting the House of Representatives, might point out. It was meant that they had the power to point out the mode and manner in which the votes should be counted. That at least is my construction of the Constitution.

As I said on a former occasion, I regard the twenty-second joint rule as an iniquity. It is a blot upon the mode and manner of counting the votes of the electoral college. It gives to either House of Congress the right to stab to the death a sovereign State of this Union. It is for that reason that I have so earnestly protested against the rule. It is a perversion of every known principle of law; for, when a certificate of election comes up prima facie, that is good enough until it is removed; and where the two Houses differ, one saying that it is not good and the other that it is good, according to every construction of law that we have learned the certificate stands in full force and effect. But, according to the twenty-second joint rule, that is reversed. If one of the Houses says that it is not good, then the balance of the authority, which is the other House, and the certificate itself, is to be overcome by one. That is against every construction of the law. By that rule the great right of a State, the privilege of a State, to say who shall be its President and its Vice-President may be stricken down.

So far as the first section of the bill is concerned, I apprehend there can be no serious objection to it. It provides clearly in regard to the counting of the electoral votes. The only remaining question, then, is raised in the second section, where two certificates of electors come up from the same State. That section provides that in that case both the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate and shall be submitted to the two Houses, and if the Houses agree upon one of those, that shall be counted; but if the Houses disagree, then the omitted case stands in full force, and the vote of the State is not counted in an election of President and Vice-President of the American Union. It is to provide a remedy for that loss of the vote of a State that I have so earnestly requested of that committee most competent to judge to make a provision to meet the case.

The view which I have and which I suggested in the outset is, that the President of the Senate is, by the authority of the Constitution, to open these votes. By the Constitution he is the presiding officer over the joint assemblage of the Senate and the House. If these two Houses disagree, a State should not be deprived of its great right of voting for President and Vice-President; and the omitted case, in my judgment, can be provided for by giving to the Vice-President, presiding over the joint assemblage of the Senate and House, the right to determine as between these two certificates when the Houses themselves divide. That, it seems to me, would cut the knot. It seems to me that it would meet the case which is omitted in the second section as reported, and would give to every State the grave and inestimable privilege of saying for themselves whom they prefer for President and Vice-President. As I have stated more than once, I do not want to leave this an open question. I do not want to see more than once a sovereign State deprived of its franchise by being thrown out by one of the Houses. In one of the presidential elections the presiding officer made an announcement that struck the American people as perhaps the most extraordinary announcement that was ever made by a presiding officer over any body of men. I do not want to see any rule established which would justify, authorize, or tolerate such an expression as once fell from the lips of a presiding officer over the joint session of the Senate and House; but I want to see a provision made whereby each one of the sovereign States of the American Union can come up, and, beyond all peradventure, beyond all doubt, cast its vote for President and Vice-President. I believe that such a provision may be made. I do not present it as the best mode, but I simply suggest that, where the two Houses do differ, the decision might safely and constitutionally be lodged in that event—because we must leave it somewher

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman.] The Chair was under the impression that the only pending amendment was the one offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper.] He is now advised that the first amendment in order is the one offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that that amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proviso to the third section of the bill reads:

That after such debate has lasted two hours, it shall be in the power of a majority of each House to direct that the main question shall be put without further debate.

It is proposed to amend that proviso so that it shall read:

Provided, That after such debate has lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee may be read, because that relates to the section we have been considering. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio really relates to a section of the bill subsequent to that which has been under con-

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] is to strike out in section 2, lines 7, 8, and 9, the following words:

The two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

And insert in lien thereof:

The House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. COOPER. I ask leave to modify my amendment, instead of striking out to leave the section as it now is and add the words:

And if the Houses do not agree on which return shall be counted, the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide which shall be the true and valid return.

So that the question shall only be left to the House voting in that way in the event that the two Houses acting separately cannot agree.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee commends itself very favorably to my mind. It is very true that when the time shall come that the governor of a State or any considerable number of persons claiming any authority shall certify a false certificate, a certificate of a false claim of election in a State, to affect the choice of the people of the United States of their Chief Magistrate, and there shall not be in both Houses of Congress a sentiment of honor and integrity that shall make such plans impossible of success, then the body-politic will be sick indeed, and we may well begin to despair of this experiment of men to govern themselves. Nevertheless we have seen, we did see in 1872, a conflict in respect of the electoral vote of one of the States of this Union, and, without going back to the history, the very sad and disgraceful history of that time, we must yet recognize the fact that that which has been may again occur, and that, although fortunately the preponderance of the electoral vote was so strong as to make this attempt inefficient for any purpose, still we ought to contemplate the possibility that such an act might have been the turning point in the choice of the President and Vice-President of this country in 1872, or may be in 1876, or some year of the future.

Now, sir, it is important that in settling this question we should do so satisfactorily to the judgment of the whole country, what I may call the sense of common honesty and right of the people, as well as the provisions of the Federal Constitution under which we assume to Grant, therefore, that no State is to be disfranchised without the concurrent vote of each House of Congress, and there is some security there; but where there are duplicate returns, or more than one return sent up from a State, then the question arises which is the true return and which should be counted? As the section now stands, it undoubtedly provides for the disfranchisement of a State in the event of the Senate and the House not being of the same mind with regard to those returns. If there shall be two returns say from this same State of Louisiana, one casting the electoral vote for one candidate and the other for another candidate, and the Senate shall decide that the votes in favor of A shall be received and the House shall decide that the votes in favor of B shall be received, between those two, the difference being irreconcilable, both votes fall and the State is Sir, such a proposition is not in accordance with justice; it is not in accordance with the genius and intent of our frame of government. Ours was to be a represented people and not a people stifled into silence by the action of either House of Congress, much less by the action of the Senate of the United States, for, be it observed, although the presidential office was not intended to be the office of popular election, for he was intended to be an officer chosen by a selected body of men, the electors as a college were to be inter-posed between the people and the President to be chosen; but custom is stronger than law; usage has become stronger than law, and so in effect the presidential office has become an entirely popular office; and, so far as any useful purpose is concerned, the electoral college might, in my opinion, be as well abolished, because in fact and practically men vote for a candidate for the Presidency or the Vice-Presidency just as directly in effect as if they did not vote for A, B, C, D, E, and F, who were to vote for him as their representatives.

The Constitution has provided, however, that in case a majority of the electoral votes cannot be discovered upon a fair count to have been cast for any one of the candidates, then the popular branch of Congress, the Representatives of the people, shall have the power, voting by States, to choose the President whom the electoral college has failed to choose. The House of Representatives, voting by States, has been said to be the ultimate arbiter of choice of this high officer. The plan of the committee, as reported in this bill, would in the event of the disagreement of the two Houses disfranchise a State and render all its efforts to elect a nullity. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee prevents the possibility of that, and giving first in a proper form the right for all parties to be heard and all certificates emanating from what purports to be lawful authority to be presented to the two Houses in joint meeting for the purpose of being counted, author-izes first a separation of the Senate and the House for the purpose of deciding which of these several returns is the just and true one, and in case they should not be able to decide then it relegates the question to that body acting in that form which the Constitution has prescribed for the election of President in case election has failed in the electoral college. The proposition seems to me to run in the current of the constitutional provision. It seems to me to recognize the broad fact that where from confusion, where from error, where from any cause there cannot be an undisturbed, definite, distinct count, satisfactory to all men as to its accuracy, made of the electoral votes, then the people of the country acting through their Representatives, voted for immediately by them, shall express their choice. The proposition of the Senator from Tennessee relieves us from the possibility of seeing a State disfranchised in the vote for President and Vice-President. That should be satisfactory to us all.

I trust and pray that no occasion for the use of this second section may arise, and that no questions will come affecting this choice as between two sets of electors. We know they cannot honestly exist. We know there must be a decision, and that if it does come it comes as the offspring and child of violence and fraud, as came the votes as the offspring in 1872, two cartificates cartifying directly opposite. from Louisiana in 1872, two certificates certifying directly opposite facts. But if it should come, if it be our shame and misfortune that such things shall be presented in the coming year, then let us provide the machinery to meet it, and to meet in accordance with the spirit, the intent, what I may term the genuis of the Constitution of our

Take the case that from any State there come up two certificates. The Houses separately consider them, and there shall be, much as I should regret to see it, a difference of opinion between the Senate and the House of Representatives as to whether one certificate or the other is the proper one to be opened and the votes to be counted. If they do so differ, however, this amendment of the Senator from Tennessee will place the case exactly as though there had been a failure to elect by a majority, and remand it to the House of Representatives, the Representatives of the people, where the States voting as States shall decide the question in accordance with the original provision and intent of the Constitution.

It seems to me that this amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has the effect of procuring an ultimate arbitration, constitutional, fair, and just, one which cannot be alleged to be in the interest of any party, because this law is not meant for one election or another. I would not stop to consider whether the effect would be ultimately, in case of a difference of opinion between the Senate and House, to throw the result in favor of the man who had my vote or that of the party with whom I acted. I have not made it a calculation, nor do I think I am capable of making it the basis of consideration in such questions as are before us; but the amendment has the merit that it prevents the disfranchisement of a State, and it provides for an arbitration to settle the question according to the very theory and meaning of our Government; that is, when the people speaking by their own voice shall not have made a decision, then, in accordance with the Constitution, those who are directly elected by the people and come freshly from them shall be suffered to speak for them. see in this amendment a great deal that is satisfactory, and if it is adopted by the Senate I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, with very great respect to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] I am compelled to dissent from his view of the constitutional provision. I cannot believe that the true construction of this clause is that the President pro tempore of the Senate, in the event of a question arising as to what is a return of electoral votes, is the conclusive and final arbiter of that question. I think that view is very contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and certainly, as was well said by one or two Senators, the language does not require any such construction. He is simply the person to whom votes are to be sent from the States. The Constitution declares that he shall open all the votes received, substantially, and then they are to be counted; and I think it would be a very unnatural construc-tion to say that if he opens two sets of returns from the State of Pennsylvania he shall decide which of them is the true return. I think then that we have to decide, or provide for deciding by some other tribunal than the President of the Senate, in the event of two returns coming from a State or a return being challenged from a State, whether it shall be counted or not.

I appreciate the serious objection there is to the second section, wherein it declares that if the Senate shall vote one way in separate session, and the House of Representatives the other, a State shall not have a voice in reference to the election of President. I am solicitous, if we can, to provide some other mode than that for disposing of the question. I think, as the duty is devolved upon the two Houses of the question. I think, as the duty is devolved upon the two Houses to count the votes, where there is a question as to what vote shall be counted, we must have power to decide how the bodies here assembled shall decide. My objection to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper]—and I only suggest it to see if we cannot remedy it—is that, while it does not disfranchise a State, it certainly does or may annul the will of the people; because, voting in that way, a State which has a single Representative in the other House, and population only for a single Representative, will have a vote on that important question equivalent to the vote of four millions of people in another State.

I suggest that it is desirable, and the intent of the Constitution is that the President shall be elected by the people and not by the States. It is true there is a provision that in a certain contingency, where the people fail to elect, the House of Representatives shall elect, each State having but one vote. But I submit whether it would not be more in accordance with the intent of the Constitution as to the election of President, if a question is to be decided bearing upon that, as we have contemplated there may be, although I hope there never will be, instead of leaving it to the House of Representatives to decide it, each State giving one vote as indicated by the amend-ment, it should be left to the House of Representatives by a majority ment, it should be left to the House of Representatives by a majority of the votes of the members; because certainly, so far as that shall have any bearing, they will more nearly represent the majority of the people of the United States who should elect the President. As this question is probably not to be decided to-day, I only suggest this, to the end that each Senator may think upon the subject; and if we are to adopt the amendment, I think it had better be modified so that the Representatives of the people in the other House shall decide the point which shall arise in reference to which returns shall be counted in the event that there are two.

the point which shall arise in reference to which returns shall be counted in the event that there are two.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to make one suggestion to my friend from New York. Would it not be better, instead of having the House of Representatives decide, to have it delegated to the democratic national convention of the preceding year? [Laughter.]

Mr. KERNAN. I am of opinion that that is where the people probably will delegate it this year; but I do not want any constitutional or legal provision here made with that view. I do not think my friend puts a fair question. The people will act for themselves in each convention, and I hope they will decide it, and that we shall never have it come here. But there was no such motive in my suggestion as the inquiry implies. The House of Representatives may be the other way at some other election. We expect that there will be such unanway at some other election. We expect that there will be such unanimity this year that no sort of counting can defeat the will of the people, and that the democratic convention will name the man. [Laughter.] But I do not want to talk that sort of thing in this question. I am simply talking about providing for all time. I should hope there never would be a body of men here that would fail to count the votes as they really were; but we are contemplating the contingency that, through fraud or through faction in States, there may be two sets of returns opened by the President of the Senate, and we have to decide upon them. It is suggested-and I treat that with great respectthat there are provisions of the bill to guard against it. I am talking about it in no partisan spirit, and I said no word that seriously should have led the Senator from Rhode Island to suppose I was talking

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not think so, of course. I only made that suggestion.

Mr. KERNAN. My friend from Iowa [Mr. Allison] says I really talk as if I was against such a thing, and I meant to be so under-

I have been looking at this bill with care, and I should regret to see it enacted into a law as it is, though it is better than nothing, in my judgment, because we do lay down some rule of action by it. It makes it the duty of the President of the Senate to open whatever comes to him certified by one acting as governor. He may find two sets from the State of New York, two sets from the State of Louisiana, two sets from another State. In view of that contingency we should now make a rule for the future that we shall be willing to abide by, no matter what party shall be in power in the two Houses or in either. I think we should do what we can to provide as wisely as we may that the question shall be decided whenever it does come.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to ask my friend from New York whether, inasmuch as the Constitution now provides that the House of Representatives, when they vote, shall vote by States, he expects the number of little States that are represented in this Congress to give to New York and Pennsylvania the preponderance they would have by voting according to representation?

Mr. KERNAN. I do not know. I think it is worthy of consideration. The Constitution now gives the election to the House when there shall be a failure to elect. The framers of the Constitution were not contemplating such troubles as have arisen. They meant when not contemplating such troubles as have arisen. They meant when the people have so voted that they have not indicated the will of a majority, then it shall be decided in the way they prescribed. But I am assuming that the trouble may arise here, though the people have really given a vote indicating what is the popular majority. We are contemplating that a question may arise about what returns shall be counted from a State in that case, the consideration of which may be swayed by feeling in reference to the result. Where the people have not failed to show here they have solved to count it is the people have not failed to choose, but we have failed to count, I would remit it to that tribunal elected by the people, which will most nearly represent their will, in the other House of Congress. That is all I mean to say.

I hope no such difficulty will occur. I hope, if it should, that every man in Congress would vote on his judgment as to what was right; but if it comes to a division between the two Houses-and it is not very likely there will be a division if the majority in both Houses is of the same party—if a division arises on counting the votes and one body elected by the States is of one party, be it the democratic to which I belong, and the majority in the other, Representatives just elected at the same presidential election, is the other way, I should think it was in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution and the theory of our Government to say "we will leave it to the popular branch just elected by the people to declare which returns shall be counted if that question affects the result and we cannot agree with

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is that, where there are two returns from a State and the two Houses acting separately cannot agree which one shall be counted, then the decision of that question shall be left to the House of Representatives voting by States, each State to have one vote; Delaware to have one vote; New York to have one vote; New vada, with one Representative, to have the same voice in settling a judicial question with New York, which has thirty-three Representa-

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And that by a House elected two years before.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. MORTON. And that by a House elected two years before. When Senators talk about representing the will of the people, can they devise a scheme for getting further away from the will of the people? because in electing a President by States the will of the people is not counted. Some time ago, two or three years ago, I had oc-casion to consider this very question of the election of President by the House of Representatives, and I made a little calculation, and the same facts and the same inequalities would exist in the decision of this question which it is proposed to leave to the House voting by States. I then said:

In the election of President in the House of Representatives under the present apportionment, each State having one vote, forty-five members out of two hundred and ninety-two may make the election, as follows—

And so forty-five members of the two hundred and ninety-two may decide the question which it is proposed to leave to the House

Delaware, Nebraska, Nevada, and Oregon have each one member, and four members would cast the votes of those four States; Rhode Island and Florida have each two, and four members would cast the votes of those States; Minnesota, New Hampshire, West Virginia, Vermont, and Kansas have each three members, and two votes in each, or ten members in all, five would cast the votes of those five States; Arkansas, California, and Connecticut have four members each, and three in cach, or nine in all, may cast their votes; Maine and South Carolina have each five members, three of whom in each, or six in both, may cast their two votes; Maryland, Mississippi, and Texas have each six members, and four in each, or twelve in all, may cast the vote of those three States. This makes mineteen States, or a majority of the States in the Union, and forty-five members may cast their votes and elect a President of the United States against the wishes of the other two hundred and forty-seven members of the House of Representatives.

This is a process for getting at the will of the people!

This is a process for getting at the will of the people!

Again, these nineteen States have an aggregate population, by the census of 1870, of a fraction over eight millions of people, while the remaining eighteen States have an aggregate population of about thirty millions. So that nineteen States, having searcely more than one-fifth of the entire population of the United States, may elect a President in the House of Representatives against the wishes of the other four-fifths; and this, by courtesy, has been called republican government!

Such a combination and result as above exhibited may not be likely to occur; but they are possible under the present system of electing a President in the House of Representatives by a majority of States; and no system admitting such possibilities should be tolerated. In 1825 it did happen that Mr. Adams was elected in the House over General Jackson, who had received a larger proportional majority of the popular vote than has any President elected since that time, and who had also a large plurality of the electoral votes.

Mr. President, one of two constructions of the Constitution must be adopted, I think.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

One construction is that the President of the Senate shall open and count the votes cast and settle all these questions; and the other is that the President of the Senate after opening the certificates shall submit them to the two Houses, and that the two Houses, acting separately as the Senate and as the House of Representatives, shall count the votes and settle all questions growing out of them. The idea that the Sonate and House of Representatives, in case of a disagreement, shall provide an umpire that shall settle disputed questions between these two Houses, seems to me, to say the least, remarkable. If we can make the House, voting by States, the umpire, then we can make the Vice-President the umpire, then we can make the President the umpire, then we can make the President the umpire, we can make a justice of the peace the umpire just as well and just as constitutionally. It is one or the other. It is either that the President of the Senate shall decide this question is either that the President of the Senate shall decide this question himself, as argued by the Senator from Maryland, or it is that the two Houses, acting in their normal capacity—the Senate acting as a Senate, each Senator having one vote, and the House acting as a House, each member having one vote—shall decide this question; and in case they cannot agree, who shall decide it? It is not defeating the will of the people; but it is simply an inability to find out what is the will of the people; and what government does actually represent the people. A contingency of that kind may occur; it would be a misfortune, and not perhaps the fault of our system of would be a misfortune, and not perhaps the fault of our system of government. It is one of those things that may happen in regard to the passage of any law, the most necessary law to the existence of the nation, appropriation bills for carrying on the Government. If the two Houses cannot agree, the bill must fail; and the necessity of passing a bill never put it into the heads of the framers of our Constitution that we should call in an umpire to settle an appropriation bill in case the two Houses could not agree.

Mr. BAYARD I wish to ask the Senator a question. Is not the latter portion of his argument fatal entirely to that which preceded it? He is claiming a power for the two Houses to act conjointly. That is an affirmative power. He is claiming a right in either House acting separately to exercise a negative power, a power of veto, that is quite as complete for the purpose of controlling this question as the affirmative power to permit a vote to be counted. If he claims that power, and claims for the Senate the right to put its veto upon the count of an electoral vote, how can he deny the power of the Senate to vest that same power in the House? He speaks of the House and the Senate acting in their normal capacity, whatever that may mean. They are differently constituted, constituted for different purposes, with very different constituencies, upon very different principles, the one representing numbers, the other representing separate communities. But if the Senator denies the power of the Senate and House to give the House in one event the power of arbitration, he may just as well the House in one event the power of arbitration, he may just as well and as consistently deny the power of either House to have the right of negativing the action of the other, which he has claimed by his bill in the second section.

But it was not necessary for the Senator to read from his former report on this question of counting the electoral votes to show that there was an inequality under the Constitution of the Union as to mere numbers in the formation of this Union. The States as separate communities formed it, and they had in the composition of this council which we constitute powers given to them as States, an equal suffrage to them irrespective of the population within their limits; and had that not been given, the Union never would have been formed. The principle is recognized by the Constitution when it provides that in the matter of selecting a Chief Magistrate on a failure to find a majority of votes in the electoral college, then the States as States voting one equal with the other shall take the place of the people and determine it.

This was not intended to be a purely popular Government, and the features of its frame-work show that it was not. There were to be checks upon numbers as well as checks upon mere local sovereignty. It was the blended form that made it complete, and that attests its wisdom; and the principle, dislike it though the Senator may, and argue against it though he may, and ridicule it though he may, in his reports, the principle stands that this Union is one of separate States, and the rights of the weakest stand level with the rights of the greatest; and so it will be until the Constitution shall be trampled under

The amendment of the Senator from Teunessee invokes that very principle which the Constitution itself is so replete with, the recognition of State sovereignty and State existence upon important occasions, and one of those occasions is when a Chief Magistrate comes to be chosen and the electoral college has failed to declare itself by a majority of its votes in favor of one or the other candidate; then and in that event the result is imperative and the duty is imperative, and the power is complete in the States meeting as States, and each one for itself, with equal voice proceeding to represent the people and elect a President for them. It is because that provision is found in the Constitution, it is because I do respect the Constitution and am sworn to bey it, that I did recommend the adoption of this amendment which provides, in the event of the failure of the Senate and House to concur as to which is the true certificate to be received by them of the elect-oral vote of a State, that then the House shall exercise its function properly as established by the Constitution and declare for them.

I have no objection at all in the event of the States being equal in number, and therefore a tie vote between them arising, that we should accept the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey and make the Vice-President the ultimate arbiter, so that he shall decide in case from these causes you have not reached a decision. But, it is all-important, that the States should not be disfranchised, that we should have a decision, and that we should come at that in a way that shall give satisfaction to all parties, and upon which we may rest all with

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, when it is said that this Union is composed of States, I agree to it; but when it is said that this is a Government of States, I disagree utterly. It is a Government of the people, and is not a Government of States.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it not a Federal Government?

Mr. MORTON. It is not a compact of States. The Constitution was formed by the people of the United States and rests upon the broad shoulders of the pation.

shoulders of the nation.

Mr. President, the clause in the Constitution providing for an elec-Mr. President, the clause in the Constitution providing for an election of President of the United States finally by the States voting as States is the most illogical provision in it, and was so recognized at the time it was adopted by at least one distinguished member of the convention, and has often been since. First, our fathers did not recognize an election by a plurality vote of the electors. The successful candidate must have a majority of all, so as to make him more nearly represent all the people of the United States; but in case he cannot get that, then the question was to be referred to the States voting as States each being equal under which as I have interstance one fifth States, each being equal, under which, as I have just shown, one-fifth of the people of the United States may elect a President; under which forty-five members of Congress out of two hundred and ninety-two may elect a President, and forty-five members may decide every question proposed to be referred to that House under this amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. Sir, we cannot afford to go any further in that direction; and I undertake to say that if we were now called upon to frame the Constitution, with our present ideas with regard to the rights of the people and the safety of electing directly by the people, and not by intermediate bodies, no such provision would be placed in the Constitution of the United States.

The idea of Congress having a right by a bill to provide an umpire to decide in case the two Houses disagree, it seems to me is so utterly foreign to our system of government that I can hardly regard it seriously. In a matter which belongs to the two Houses of Congress, if it belongs to them at all, and not to the Vice-President, that they can delegate their power to the House voting by States, or to the Court of Claims, or to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to any distinguished private person, is utterly at war with our whole any distinguished private person, is utterly at war with our whole theory of constitutional government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not mean to say that my friend from Indiana is not right; but there are a good many analogies for it. In Wisconsin they elected a governor, and yet, after one man was proclaimed the governor, there was an umpire in the shape of a court of justice that declared another man elected and turned him out. We have in the discourse of great providings are provided to the discourse of the state of the have in the discussion over Pinchback's case a good many times referred to an umpire who, after the people of Louisiana had decided, settled the question as to which was the governor. Now it seems to me that, where the Constitution commits a subject to Congress and yet leaves it so undefined, so general, we have a power according to our discretion by law to carry out the authority committed to us; but while I say this I want to reserve my right to vote against the suggestion that I have made, because the Senator may convince me that I am wrong; a thing which does not often occur, however, I notice in the Senate

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I believe under the constitution of Wisconsin it was held that the question of a contested gubernatorial wisconsin it was neat that the question of a contested guestion and election might be decided by the courts of that State. Just the reverse was held in the State of Arkansas. It depended upon the wording of the constitution. The Legislature decided a question of contested election between contending candidates for governor. The supreme court of that State assumed the jurisdiction to decide the same question and awarded the office to another man. That is a very recent thing and within our recollection here. The Attorney-General and, if I mistake not, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, of which my friend from New Jersey is a very distinguished member, were consulted, and from New Jersey is a very distinguished member, were consulted, and they decided that the jurisdiction belonged exclusively to the Legislature of Arkansas and that the supreme court had no jurisdiction over it. I may be wrong about my recollection of the affair, but that is it. I speak of the general principle that, where powers are devolved upon a legislature or upon Congress—questions to be decided by the Legislature of a State or by Congress—the decision of those questions cannot be delegated to an umpire or to any third tribunal. That is the general principle, which I think may be safely asserted here.

Mr. President, I understand that there are Senators who desire not the layer this year taken to day: and as I am not at all urgent about it.

The SPEAKER. What is the length of the petition?
Mr. CAMPBELL. It is very brief. I ask that it be read.
The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable members of the Senate and House of Representatives in congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, legal voters of the ninth congressional district in the State of Illinois, respectfully represent that the producing and industrial classes are being ruined by the financial system now in force in the United States, and urgently ask of you, our Representatives and legislative agents—

First. The unconditional repeal of the resumption act.
Second. The withdrawal of the national-bank-note circulation.
Third. That legal-tender paper currency be issued direct from the Treasury of the United States and made interchangeable with Government bonds bearing the lowest possible rate of interest; which paper currency shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and be applied to the immediate redemption of all bonds heretofore issued and made payable at the option of the Government, except where the conditions of the contract specify payment in gold.

Rooms of the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade, No. 87 Wall Street, New York, March 8, 1876.

At a special meeting of the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade of the City of New York, held this day, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the issue of millions of paper promises to pay, made by act of Congress to perform the functions of money, while resulting in a period of delusive prosperity, has been followed by a long-continued depression, which still prevades all departments of business; and whereas the unsettled condition of the public mind furnishes the occasion for designing men to propose fallacious measures of relief, which, if adopted, would serve only to increase the evils they propose to remedy; and whereas the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade of the City of New York desires to place itself on record as unalterably opposed to any measures looking toward further inflation and consequent repudiation, and as earnestly in favor of that sound and honest currency which experience has proved to be the most conducive to the happiness and prosperity of the people: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, I. That an early resumption of specie payments is the first measure to the restoration of confidence in our financial system, in the absence of which it is hopeless to look for the return to healthy activity in any of the varied interests of the country.

"2. That the highest considerations of the public good imperatively demand additional legislation on the part of Congress in authorizing and providing for a gradual withdrawal and cancellation of the legal-tender notes, as well as securing a reserve of gold in the Treasury to an extent sufficient to insure the fulfillment of the pledge given by the last Congress fixing the last of January, 1879, as the date for resumption, and that the repeal of that law can be regarded only as a step toward repudiation and national dishonor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at sixteen minutes after twelve o'clock; and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

Mr. HURLBUT. Was it not the understanding that the regular luminess of Monday would be postpoped that the appropriation bill business of Monday would be postponed that the appropriation bill might be taken up?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Not till after the morning hour.
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand it in that way;

but it is possible such an understanding may have been had when the present occupant of the chair was not in it.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would suggest that it would very much facilitate the business of Congress if the House would unanimously permit the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill to go on, passing by the usual Monday proceedings. I should be very glad if that were done.

that were done.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is better there should be the usual call of States for bills and joint resolutions during the morning hour. This avoids the constant applications we are otherwise compelled to make during the progress of the week to introduce bills. I suggest that the usual call of States should proceed, and that after that the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative bill. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Before the regular order proceeds, the Chair will lay before the House sundry communications.

lay before the House sundry communications.

RIVER FRONT OF SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2669) to amend section 4053 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2670) to amend section 3420 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DECEASED POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2671) to provide for the custody and safe-keeping of the property of the United States in the possession of a deceased postmaster at the time of his death, and for the performance of the duties of his office until a successor be appointed and qualified; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN.

Mr. PIERCE introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the accommodation of sick and disabled seamen in the district of Cape Cod, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF CALVIN CUMMINGS.

Mr. WILSHIRE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2672) referring the claim of the legal representatives of Calvin Cummings to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SALT LANDS.

Mr. DUNNELL presented the memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in relation to salt lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

I ask unanimous consent to

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair.) The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent under this call; it is only for bills for reference.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. BLAINE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2673) to amend certain titles of sections 48 and 52 of the Revised Statutes, for the regulation of commerce and navigation, and the regulation of steam-vessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOLIDAY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APRIL 14.

Mr. BLAINE also (by request) introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 84) declaring April 14, 1876, a legal holiday in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES TULLIS.

Mr. CASON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2674) directing the Secretary of the Interior to date back the pension certificate of James Tullis, No. 116532, to the 22d of January, 1874, and authorizing the payment of his pension, at the rate he now draws the same, from that date to the 17th day of June, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MEADE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2675) to provide for the more certain resumption of specie payments on January 1, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, as a substitute for House bill No. 2132, a bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDS OF CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Appropriations to inquire into the forma-tion of the division in the Treasury Department known as the divis-ion "having charge of the proceeds of captured and abandoned prop-erty," &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A STEAMER.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the further consideration by the House of the bill (H. R. No. 2269) to change the name of the steamboat Twilight, of New York, to that of Amsdell.

SAILORS' HOME, SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. PIPER. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed in the RECORD. It is a memorial from the Ladies' Seamen's Friend Society of San Francisco, California; and all I ask is that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce and that the brief memorial which precedes the signatures may be read and printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that about the year 1853, the United States erected in San Francisco a marine hospital for the care of sick and disabled sailors, which was carried on for several years, and finally abandoned to time's decay; it is now in a very dilapidated condition, and useless for any Government purpose. The great number of shipwrecked and destitute sailors who come to this port excited to action some of the prominent and charitable ladies of this city, and some twenty years ago they organized "the Ladies' Scamen's Friend Society," "to relieve shipwrecked and destitute sailors, and to protect seamen against the pernicious influences and injustice to which they are subjected in this port, and for such other purposes as shall tend to their moral and intellectual improvement."

One important act of the society was to lay before Congress the vices existing in relation to engaging and shipping sailors, and asked for their protection by the passage of a law providing for shipping commissioners, which was signed by the President June 8, 1872. This law is now in force, and doing great good in this port under the management of Colonel Jonathan D. Stevenson, shipping commissioner.

The members of the society, seeing the necessity of having a well-conducted

The members of the society, seeing the necessity of having a well-conducted home for sailors, have for several years exerted their energies to that end, and, by well-directed industry, have raised considerable money, and bought a lot now worth about $20,000. This lot the society propose to sell, and use the proceeds in improving the old marine hospital, and furnish it for a sailors' home, if Congress will permit it.

The marine hospital building was erected for the benefit of the sailors, and we ask that we may continue it for the same purpose, without further expense to the ask that we may continue it for the same purpose, without further expense to the United States.

We respectfully represent that the society propose to have a cheap, clean, and commodious boarding and lodging house, with reading and lecture rooms, so attractive that sailors will not be compelled to find places for pastime and amusement in the dens of vice, where they are robbed of their money and then kicked out of doors. The Scamen's Temperance League meets in this city every Sunday evening, at the shipping commissioner's rooms, where about two thousand have signed the temperance pledge during the last year, and many crews have been sent to sea sober; but they need a home where they may be kept sober after taking the nledge.

Therefore we respectfully pray that Congress will grant the marine hospital and grounds, situated on a block located between Harrison, Folsom, Maine, and Spear streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, to be used by the "Ladies' Seamen's Friend Society of the port of San Francisco," for a sailors' home as long as it may be used by the society for that purpose.

EXTENDING TIME FOR APPLICATIONS FOR PENSIONS.

Mr. MacDOUGALL asked and obtained unanimous consent to have the following printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

Headquarters Department of New York,
Grand Army of the Republic,
Assistant-Adjutant-General's Office, Room 122, Trinity Building, 111 Broadway, New York, March 7, 1876.

Dear Sir and Comrade: At the annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, department of New York, held at Albany, on the 25th and 26th January ultimo, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the representatives of this State in Congress be requested to secure the passage of a bill extending the time for the filing of applications for pensions."

pensions."

In accordance with the above, I have the honor on behalf of this order to forward this communication to you. Permit me to hope that it will meet with your approval, and that I may be favored with an early acknowledgment of the receipt of the same.

Yours in F., C., and L.,

JAMES TANNER.

JAMES TANNER, Department Commander.

DEFAULTING COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted the following resolution, and moved that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to state to this House the actual balance due from collectors of Internal revenue who are not now in office, since the organization of that Bureau; that the names of such defaulting collectors be given with the amount due from each, and the total amount due from all of those who are in default; that he also inform this House of the names of the defaulting collectors who have been sued, with the date of the suit, together with the date of resignation of the defaulting collectors, and the name of the President by whom and the time when appointed.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I offer by request the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk, and move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House whether officers of the Army have been promoted since the 22d day of June, 1874, as provided in section 1204 of the Revised Statutes, and if not, the reason for the same.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

THE UNITED STATES A NATION.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I send a resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read, and move that the rules be suspended so as to adopt the resolution now, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the people of the United States constitute one nation and not a mere confederacy of States or nations; that the Constitution was formed by the people acting in their primary and individual capacity through their delegates thereto duly constituted; that the Government under the Constitution is one of the people, by the people, and for the people; that in its appropriate sphere the Government of this nation is sovereign and supreme; that in its nature it is permanent and indissoluble except by the act and consent of the whole people; that no State has the right or authority to judge of the constitutionality of the laws enacted by it, and to nullify or resist the execution of the same; and that all overt acts by any State or the people thereof of secession therefrom, or of rebellion against the same, constitute treason; and that the late war of the rebellion for the dismemberment of the Union was causeless and indefensible on any theory of right or constitutional law.

Mr. COX. I hope this resolution will be referred. It may be very good; but it will take up a good deal of time.

good; but it will take up a good deal of time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending a motion to suspend the rules, one motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. STONE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I desire to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

The motion of Mr. Stone, that the House adjourn, was not agreed to. Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion divisi-

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, it is not. The motion is to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. Would it be in order to read from the Constitution the following?

Done in Convention by the unanimous consent of the States.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER. It would not be. [Laughter.] The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 75, not voting 117; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:
Mr. MILLIKEN. My colleague, Judge Durham, is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. PLATT. My colleague, Mr. Adams, is absent by leave of the House on important business. If he were present he would vote

"ay."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am paired with Mr. Davis, of North Carolina. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "ay;" and I presume that Mr. Davis, if here, would vote "no."

Mr. DANFORD. The gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. CROUNSE, is confined to his bed by sickness.

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, Mr. Bradford, is absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, said: It is apparent, Mr. Speaker, that a large number of gentlemen on the floor of the House have not voted. I call for the reading of the rule.
Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?
The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I call for the reading of Rule 31 requiring members to vote when present on the floor of the House. After that rule is read, I ask that it be enforced. Several Members. How will you do it?
Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. That rests with the Speaker, not with me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. The demand is not in time, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a good deal of truth in this resolution, but also a good deal of false inference. We will vote the next time. The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

UNION.

Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolutions, which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the people of the United States constitute a nation in the sense, to the extent, and for the purposes defined in the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States is a Federal Union, and was formed by the people of the several States in their sovereign capacity, that the rights and powers of the United States Government are defined and limited by the Federal Constitution, and these rights and powers cannot be enlarged nor diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Resolved, That the rights of the States have the same sanction and security in the Constitution as the right- and powers of the Federal Government, and that local domestic government by the several States within the limits of the Constitution is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the liberties of the citizen and the continuance of our republican system of government.

Resolved, That the doctrine that a State has a right to secede from the Union is in conflict with the idea of a "perpetual union" as contemplated by the Constitution and should be regarded as being forever extinguished by the results of the recent civil conflict.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules pend the rules.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope so; and I hope every Union man in the House will vote against them. [Cries of "O!" from the democratic side of the House.] I hope so decidedly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the resolutions be again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that no gentleman has a right to interrupt the Chair in the midst of an announcement like this to the ouse. [Applause.] Mr. HOAR. I rose to a question of order before the Chair began his announcement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware of any such effort on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Those in favor of the motion to suspend the rules, will vote "ay," and those opposed "no." The Chair has now made the announcement, and directs the Clerk to again report the resolutions.

The resolutions were again read.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative; yeas 150, nays 42, not voting 97; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. In what respect?
The SPEAKER. In stating reasons in the nature of debate.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No; I am not, but merely stating my pair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that in stating reasons the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair. Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York has a right to state a pair, but no right to give reasons for his action.

Mr. RANDALL. When the gentleman from New York was stopped

he was evidently going on to state reasons in the nature of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York was proceeding to say that upon his mind in reference to this pending matter there were questions of doubt-reasons both ways, conflicting reasons. It is against that kind of statement that the Chair made his ruling.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will say now, with the permission of the Chair, that I did not speak a word of what the Chair supposed I did. In all kindness I wish now to say so. What I said was this: that I was paired with Mr. Davis, of North Carolina; that I was in doubt whether we should differ, and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "ay." I did not know Mr. Davis would do so, and it was only for fear I might conflict with Mr. DAVIS that I refrained from voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no objection to that statement.

Mr. YEATES. And I wish to say that my colleague, Mr. Davis, if he were here, would vote "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, is absent in consequence of a death in his family.

Mr. COX. My colleague, Mr. HEWITT, has been called home by important business.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say that Mr. Durham, of Kentucky, is detained at home on account of sickness.

Mr. SINGLETON. My colleague, Colonel Lamar, is absent from the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SUBSIDY BONDS.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask that the report of their subcommittee on the resolution requiring them to inquire into what legislation is necessary to indemnify the United States for interest advanced on the subsidy bonds of the Pacific railroad companies be printed for the use of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REDUCTIONS BY LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. I have prepared a statement showing the estimates for the employés of all the Departments, and showing also the reduction made in the legislative, &c., appropriation bill now in Committee of the Whole House. I ask that it may be printed for the use of the House

The SPEAKER. Is it in the nature of a report from a committee?

Mr. FOSTER. I have prepared it as a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Foster] makes this statement on his own responsibility, but the Committee on Appropriations do not object to its being printed.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same: An act (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel

Cooper, jr., of Virginia; and An act (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with section 208 of the Revised Statutes, a report upon the commercial relations of the United States with foreign countries for the year 1875. Accompanying this communication are very numerous and very lengthy documents. The Chair will direct the communication and accompanying papers to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, without printing, or to await the future order of the House in regard to printing.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also desires to lay before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting reports of the Bureaus of Steam Engineering, Construction and Repair, Equipment and Recruiting, &c., in response to House resolution of January 13, 1876. Accompanying this communication also are voluminous papers. The Chair will direct the communication and the accompanying reports to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, without printing, until further order of the House.

CONTESTED ELECTION-LEE VS. RAINEY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Samuel Lee vs. Joseph H. Rainey, first district of South Carolina; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

DANIEL STICKNEY.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of Daniel Stickney, of Presque Isle, Maine; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to bring before the consideration of the House the report of the conference committee on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of the said commissioners, and for other purposes. In order that the House may understand this question, I send to the Clerk's desk the joint resolution as it will be if the report of the conference committee should be adopted, and ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District, issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, estitled "Anact for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the sum necessary to pay the same from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools: Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: Analyrovided, That the said commissioners are hereby directed to discontinue all work and labor on streets, avenues, bridges, sewers, canals, and structures of every kind the payment for which is to be made in 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia: Anal provided further, That so much of the sixth section of the said act of June 20, 1874, as directs and requires the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to audit and adjust the floating and unfunded debt of the District of Columbia, and issue certificates therefor, and of the joint resolution continuing the board of audit to examine and audit the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia, approved December 21, 1874, and of the act to extend the rime within which the board of audit of the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board, approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and all compensation allowed to said board of audit for their services under the provision of said act of June 20, 1874, and theacts amendatory thereof, shall cease; and after the expiration of thirty days from the approval audit shall be turned over to the commissioners of the present amount of the total indebtedsuccessors in office.

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. BUCKNER. It will be recollected by the House that when this question was up some two or three weeks ago, and postponed in order that the report which I have just caused to be read at the Clerk's desk should be printed, objection was made to the action of the conference committee on the part of the House, because we had not insisted, as I understand it, upon a proposition adopted in the Senate that no bonds issued after the 27th of January last should be paid.

I will say, in reference to that, that so far as the action of this House could effect that object, we attempted to make that provision; but it failed because the conference committee on the part of the Senate were opposed to any such action. That the House may understand how the matter stands in regard to these bonds issued since the 27th of January, I will send to the Clerk's desk a communication from the treasurer himself in charge of this sinking fund, one of the officers of the sinking fund, showing the action of the sinking-fund commissioners on the subject of the bonds issued since the 27th of January. It will appear that these bonds amount to $149,000, and that not one of these bonds has been issued upon certificates issued that not one of these bonds has been issued upon certificates issued since the 1st December last, except one certificate of $2,700.

All the bonds issued by these sinking-fund commissioners, against which this objection was raised, were issued upon certificates that were then in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioners and for which they had agreed to issue bonds. And, on the 25th of January, immediately after the action of this House and before the action of the Senate, they passed a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk in connection with the letter showing what has been done in reference to the issue of those bonds since the 26th of January. The Clerk will read the letter and then the resolution on which the commissioners have acted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, Washington, D. C., February 19, 1876.

Sir: In reply to your letter of yesterday I have the honor to state that at the close of 26th January last, there had been issued by us in exchange for certificates of the board of audit 3.65 bonds to the amount of $13,558,700.

There have been since issued, in exchange for certificates of board of audit presented prior to January 25, 1876:

account beans as a comment, and account
On January 27	$35,000
On January 28	87, 000
On January 29	24, 000
On January 31	20, 200
On February 2	18, 350

184, 550

Making, in all now outstanding, $13,743,250.

The inclosed copy of a resolution unanimously adopted by our board on the 25th January last, will explain the reason of our recent action on this subject.

With much respect, your obedient servant,

MOSES KELLY, Treasurer.

Hon. A. H. Buckner, Chairman District Committee, House of Representatives.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas a proposition is now pending in Congress for the transfer to the Department of the Treasury of the United States of the duties heretofore performed by this board; and whereas a bill has been introduced and is now pending to prevent the further issue of 3.65 per cent. District of Columbia bonds: Therefore, Be it resolved, That no further issue of said 3.65 per cent. District of Columbia bonds be made by this board until the Congress of the United States shall have acted upon the amount of bonds to be issued, excepting so far as necessary to complete the delivery of those for which applications have thus far been filed, $363,400. True copy from the record:

MOSES KELLY,

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE SINKING FUND, Washington, February 19, 1876.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will state, sir, further on that point, that that portion of the resolution to which objection was made on a former occasion was introduced on the 3d of February, and there have been no bonds issued since the 3d of February at all.

I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, when this measure was pending in

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, when this measure was pending in the House an effort was made by an amendment to declare that nothing in this act should further bind the United States to the payment of this debt than the obligation already assumed. That amendment may not have accomplished the purpose. It was drawn up hastily and perhaps did not fully do so; but the purpose of the House in its adoption was manifestly to prevent the Government from assuming greater responsibility than it had heretofore assumed by former legislation. islation.

It seems to me, sir, that no bill should pass Congress in regard to these 3.65 bonds except one that clearly and explicitly repels any presumption that the Government of the United States is assuming in the passage of the act liability beyond that already incurred. I hope that the House will consent to non-concur in this report of the committee of conference, and to recommit the bill and the pending amendments to the same committee of conference on the part of the House, and that further effort will be made to relieve the Government of the United States from other responsibility than that already incurred. I hope that a proposition substantially like the following will be adopted and added to the bill:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to create an obligation on the part of the United States to pay the interest or the principal of said bonds or to give validity to any bonds which have been issued without authority of law.

I do not think, sir, that with the fact before the House that bonds perhaps to the amount of a million and a half of dollars have been issued without authority of law-certainly this board of commissioners have exercised authority conferred upon them by the act of 1874—I do not think, in view of the fact that the House is informed that bonds have been issued in excess of the authority conferred upon the board, validity should be given to these bonds by language which should admit of such interpretation.

I therefore, sir, insist that Congress in passing this bill shall expressly declare that they will provide for the payment of interest on such bonds as were lawfully issued under the act of 1874, and that in the passage of that act Congress did not mean to bind the United States for the payment of principal or interest of the bonds, or to give validity to bonds issued without authority of law. I think that the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] who has examined this subject very fully, and is aware of the mistakes heretofore made, will see the propriety of incorporating such a provision into the law giving interpretation to the act of 1874 and the subsequent legisla-

Every effort has been made to induce the Government to place this debt upon the same footing as the other bonded debt of the United States; to put these bonds in the debt statement, so as to make them a debt of the United States instead of the people of this District. To be sure, by an act of the last Congress, Congress devolved the duty of raising this money upon the people of the District, and I trust that Congress will not undertake by this legislation to carry out the unhappy legislation that grew up when the board of commissioners was appointed and the District government was abolished. Whatever responsibility that creates on the Government of the United States, of course we shall have to stand by, but I object to going one step beyond. All I ask is that in any new legislation there shall be this express declaration, that the Government does not assume the payment of the bonds, that this law shall receive no such interpretation, and that we do not give validity to any bonds issued without authority

Mr. Speaker, one other word. I admit that if the Committee for the District of Columbia, which has been so patiently investigating the transactions out of which have grown these bonds, had made its final report, if all the facts touching the issuing of these bonds were before the House and it was possible that we should pass judgment on the subject, we might pass a law without any such limitation or restriction as that mentioned. But the committee have not made a report; they have not informed the House of the real facts; we are not informed to what extent there has been fraud practiced in the creation of this debt. The capital is filled with grave charges of fraud against all the persons who have been connected with this added public debt on the people of this District. Let us give it no other validity than it is entitled to have. Let the bonds lawfully issued be provided for by the people of this District under such legislation as Congress may think proper to adopt. But I do ask, gentlemen, that by no possibility shall we be permitted to place on the Federal Government any greater liability than that already assumed.

I must say that the act which abolished this District government and provided this board of commissioners, under which these bonds have been issued, was as unfortunate a law as ever passed Congress We were compelled to abolish the District government and put an end to a wide system of fraud. But in doing so we seem to have imposed upon the whole people of the United States obligations and debts which ought to be borne by the citizens of this District alone, who, through their District government, have been engaged in this vast sys tem of public improvement and getting up a great debt, in part predicated on manifest frauds. This is all I have to submit, except to ask that the Clerk now read the proposition which I desire to have ingrafted on this joint resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman does not understand that I have yielded the floor for any such proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. No. This report, of course, is not subject to amendment. But I wish to have read the proviso which I desire to have added to this joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided. That nothing in this act shall be construed to create an obligation on the part of the United States to pay the interest or principal of said bonds, or to give validity to any bonds which may have been issued without authority of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] I desire to enter a motion to non-concur in this conference report, and to recommit the same with the bill and pending amendments to the conference committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not yield for any such motion. I will now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Cate,] a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CATE. I do not think that the provise of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] even if it should be given the effect of law, could add anything to the protection of the United States in this regard. It will be borne in mind that these bonds, if issued at all, are issued in accordance with a provision of law which purports to define as well the liability of the Government of the United States as that of the District of Columbia. No implied obligation will rest against the United States in consequence of the payment of this interest, and for the simple reason that that liability, whatever it may be, must be determined by the construction of the law under which these bonds were issued. Therefore the payment of the interest would not affect or add to the liability of the Government at all. This liability, if there be any, is in accordance with the law under which these bonds are issued.

It seems to me that the provision which the gentleman has intro-duced will add nothing to the protection of the Government. The Government is bound for these bonds in accordance with the law under which they were issued. It is liable for the payment of these bonds, if under that law it was primarily liable. If under the law there was no primary liability, then I hold that the direction of the payment of this interest does not create a liability. If the Government is not primarily liable under that law, then of course there is

What is the purpose of the proviso of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman?] What will it accomplish? As I have shown, it will accomplish nothing toward protecting the Government, but will have the effect of discrediting these bonds in the market. That will be the only effect of it. Is that desirable? I hold it is not desirable, unless something can be accomplished by it, unless the Government is to be benefited by it, unless the Government is to be benefited by discrediting these bonds in the market, for that can be the only effect of such a proviso.

The House will remember that there were two tribunals organized under the law of 1874, for the purpose of providing for and funding the debt of this District. Both tribunals had distinct jurisdiction and distinct duties to perform. The board of audit was to pass these accounts and to audit such accounts as arose under that law. They were then to certify to the commissioners, and the commissioners were to issue the bonds. Both tribunals were distinct, the one not dependent at all upon the other. The funding commissioners had no discretion; they were bound to issue bonds upon such certificates as were presented to them by the board of audit. Therefore, I say that, so far as I have been able to ascertain in the course of this investigation, there is nothing that tends to show that the commissioners have exceeded their jurisdiction at all.

As I said before, if these bonds were issued in pursuance of law, if under this law of 1874 there was authority on the part of the sinking-fund commissioners to issue these bonds, then of course they are good in the hands of an innocent holder. As I understand it, there is but one objection that can be urged against the validity of these bonds in the hands of innocent purchasers: that is the want of authority on the names of innecent purchasers: that is the want of atthority on the part of the persons who issued these bonds. It is likely that, in the auditing of claims which have been presented under this act, larger sums have been audited than ought to have been. It is quite likely that there may be some ground for the belief that bonds have been actually issued in some instances for a larger sum than was really due. What I mean to say is that it is likely the board of audit have sometimes certified accounts that really were not due or that were greater than should have been allowed, whether through fraud or otherwise, I am not able to say; but it is likely such things have occurred. The commissioners knew nothing of this; the accounts came to them certified, and they could do nothing but to issue bonds for the full amount so certified. I hold that these bonds are good, as a matter of course, in the hands of innocent purchasers. We cannot inquire whether the in the hands of innocent purchasers. board of audit have allowed any larger sum than they ought to have allowed. As to bonds in the hands of innocent holders, we cannot try the question whether the amount for which any of these bonds were issued was really due. The only question we can inquire into is whether the bonds have been issued by the sinking-fund commissioners in pursuance of law. If they have not been, then the Gov-ernment is not bound for them; but if they have been issued in pursuance of law, then the Government is responsible for them wherever

Mr. HOLMAN. If the board of commissioners were authorized to do certain work, for which bonds might issue to cover the expense of that work, and if the commissioners, going beyond the powers conferred upon them, have made other and different improvements, have entered into new contracts, and issued new certificates not contemplated by the law of 1874, and if bonds were predicated upon these palpable violations of law, does my friend think the Government of the United States is bound by the law of 1874 to guarantee the payment of the principal and interest of such bonds of the District of

Mr. CATE. I answer, no, sir; and the gentleman will observe that I have already covered his questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is exactly what I am trying to guard against by my proposition.

Mr. CATE. But it is altogether unnecessary. does not add to the protection of the Government at all; and its only effect is to discredit the bonds, or, as the gentleman from Missouri expressed it the other day, to "give the bonds a black eye" in the market. In this way it affects those who may have expected to realize something out of the sale of the bonds for the purpose of paying their debts.

If bonds have been issued without authority of law, then I admit that the Government is not liable. But that is the very question; and this proposition does not touch that question at all. The law under the control of work has been done in violation of law—if work has been done in violation of law—if work has been done in violation of law—if work doubtedly is that if work has been done in violation of law—if work not contemplated by the law of 1874 has been done—then the bonds are void, no matter where they may be found, and no such declaration as that now proposed is required in order to enable the Government to defend itself from the payment of those bonds. What we desire is that this matter shall be put in such a shape that the interests of no private parties shall be prejudiced, so long as the interests of the Government are not injuriously affected.

The committee of conference had this whole matter before them; and while we did not suppose it possible that we on the part of the House could obtain all that we desired or that the Senate committee could obtain all that it desired, our object was to arrive at some common ground which would accomplish the general object of the resolution, the payment of this interest. Now, unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] can show that some benefit is to result to the Government by the introduction of such a proposition as he has presented, I submit that it ought not to be adopted, because we can all see the influence that such a measure most have upon these bonds.

Mr. HOLMAN. My object is simply the protection of the Government against further fraud; nothing more.

Mr. CATE. And I want to protect the Government against further fraud; but I do not desire to attach to the resolution anything that does not add a feather's weight to the protection of the Government, but has merely the effect of discrediting the bonds in the market. One gentleman has said to me that he had bonds on deposit which would have to be sold on or before a certain date for the purpose of raising money to pay off his hands, and that a proposition of this kind would depreciate the bonds several per cent. Gentlemen can easily see its effect. People are wary in regard to securities of this kind; and a provision like this has an important bearing on the selling value of bonds of this character.

I have already said that if work was done in violation of lawyou can show that under a proper construction of the law of 1874 the work for which these bonds were issued was done without authority of law-then the bonds are void, no matter where they may be. distinguishing difference in regard to the validity of securities of this kind is just this: If the security is issued without authority of law it is void everywhere; if there has been simply an excess of jurisdiction or authority in arriving at the consideration of the bonds, then the bonds in the hands of innocent holders are good. You cannot expect a readjustment of this matter. then the bonds in the hands of innocent holders are good. You cannot expect a re-adjustment of this matter. No matter where the bonds have gone, you cannot expect these accounts to be overhauled for the purpose of seeing whether too much or too little has been allowed. We cannot expect this at the hands of persons who have purchased these bonds. We propose to leave the liability of the Government to be determined upon a fair construction of the law of 1874; that is all. And while we agree upon that common ground there can be no question here that if the work for which these bonds were issued was not contemplated by the law of 1874 the Government is not sued was not contemplated by the law of 1874, the Government is not liable. I say we can all meet on this common ground. What, then, is the object or utility of this proposition of the gentleman from Indiana? It seems to me that the committee of conference have reported the matter in the best possible shape. If it is desirable at all to pay this interest I do not see why the House should not adopt this report as being as fair an adjustment as can be attained.

Mr. SAVAGE. If these bonds were illegal, but if the Government (waiving for the time being the question of illegality) should pay the interest on the bonds, and they should afterward, on the faith of the payment of that interest, be transferred to the hands of innocent holders, would not the Government be bound to pay the bonds, regardless of the fact that they were illegal in the first instance?

Mr. CATE. I hold that the liability of the Government is an express one. It is determined by the act of 1874. There is no implication that can intervene to affect the liability of the Government at all.

The Government is paying these bonds—
Mr. SAVAGE. If the Government shall pay the interest and for the time waive all question, would it not give such validity on the part of the Government of the United States as to place it within the power of those now holders of these bonds, who are not innocent, to impose on some persons hereafter by the sale of the bonds to them?

Mr. CATE. I have covered that question already in my statement as to the liability of the Government under the act of June 20, 1874. If we are liable at all for these bonds, we are liable because that act makes us liable. If we are not liable, it is because that act does not impose any obligation upon us to pay them.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now yield for fifteen minutes to my colleague,

[Mr. PHILIPS.]

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, my predilections were against this bill at the outset on account of imputations east upon the integrity of the officers in charge of the affairs of this District, but my confidence in the integrity and judgment of my colleague [Mr. BUCK-NER] was such that my attention was drawn to a more careful consideration of the bill, and I have become satisfied in my own mind, after investigation and coming into possession of the facts, that there is as a matter of law no other alternative left to the Government than to pay the interest on these bonds.

I desire to say in the beginning that I have neither any purpose nor any interest to excuse or set down aught in extenuation of the con-duct of the officials of this District, for I am satisfied in my own mind, in advance of any judicial investigation or determination, that these officers have transcended their authority, that they have abused the

But, sir, as legislators, as practical men, the question that confronts us here is what is proper, what is prudent, what is right to be done in view of the law as it is and of the facts as they exist, both of which are beyond our power to control, so far as they exist, both of which are beyond our power to control, so far as the past is concerned.

The sixth section of the act of June 20, 1874, which called into being this board of audit, will be found on examination to confer upon it very extraordinary powers. They are ministerial officers, charged with the duty and invested with the power of making certain examinations and auditing certain accounts. It will be found on examination of the section that this board is made sole judge under the law of what is proper and what is improper to be audited. The seventh section continues the old sinking-fund commissioners and authorizes section continues the old sinking-fund commissioners, and authorizes them to issue such bonds as may be certified by the board of audit in sums of $50 and $500. Then it contains this provision:

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

Now the only limitation that is placed in the law upon the authority of the sinking-fund commissioners is in this 7th section, and it is as follows:

And said commissioners shall use all necessary means for the prevention of any nauthorized or fraudulent issue of any of such bonds.

And the second section, which called into existence the commissioners, places this limitation only upon their authority:

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation, other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

The same section imposes upon the commissioners an oath of office

The same section imposes upon the commissioners an oath of office to support the Constitution, without fixing any penalty to it whatever, and exacts from them a bond only of $50,000, when, as the sequel proves, they were invested with power to issue $13,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know if the gentleman's committee or this conference committee has come to this conclusion in reference to this matter? The gentleman has just read the law providing for a certain class of contracts "executed and to be executed" for which these bonds might be issued. I desire to know if, passing beyond those contracts "executed and to be executed," they have made street extensions beyond those contracts, or contracts entirely beyond the extensions beyond those contracts, or contracts entirely beyond the language of the statute and issued certificates and bonds, and whether in that case this committee holds the Government can have no pro-

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman. The difficulty, Mr. Speaker, is an inherent defect in the organic act itself. The proper preventive for the evils of which we to-day complain would have been to have placed in this act a limitation as to the amount of bonds which might be issued by this board in any event, and to have provided an explicit system of registration; next to have made it a felony for these officers to have transcended their lawful authority; and in the last place, though not least, for the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to stop placing in high official positions dishonest men. But, sir, we are to take the law as we find it and the facts as they exist, both of which are beyond our control to retrieve the past.

Now, we find the facts to be that after a year and a half's experiments under this statute, these commissioners and the board of audit have exceeded by some $4,000,000 what was supposed to be the proper amount for them to issue under this law. If my friend from Indiana, Judge Holman, who is a good lawyer, would take the pains to examine the bonds which have been issued under the seventh section, he will find that they all purport on their face to have been issued in pursuance of the law, bearing date in 1874. The bonds specify upon their face that they have been issued pursuant to this act of June 20, 1874, and the provisions of the act are printed upon the back of the bond, and especially this provision of the seventh section, pledging both the faith of the Government and the property of

Now, I take the law to be that if those bonds thus issued are in the hands of third parties, without notice of the fact that frauds have been perpetrated in their issue, the Government is bound to pay them. And I will say further that it is not in the experience of any lawyer within the sound of my voice that any of the bonds of this class issued within the last few years anywhere in the States, or bonds issued by municipal corporations, are ever found to be in the hands of individuals having notice; for when men start out deliberately to defraud the people by the issue of bonds of municipal and county corporations, they always have their confederates, and the bonds, as soon as deliv-ered, are spirited away and put into the possession of third parties, who are always innocent parties per se.

Mr. Speaker, I have had a very sad experience in the matter of defending this class of bonds. The notion that long prevailed among lawyers touching the doctrine of principal and agent, that a principal was not bound by the act of his agent beyond the bounds of his delegated authority without a ratification—a doctrine that was supposed to be a canon of the common law—has long since been exploded in our Supreme Court. Beginning with the case of Aspinwall against Knox County, 21 Howard, down to 20 Wallace, the gentleman will find this to be the law; that no matter what may have been the irregularities or frauds which preceded the issue of these bonds, yet if there be a law in existence to authorize their issue under any circumstances wheteverset the bonds averaged the cumstances whatever, and the bonds purport on their face to have been issued in pursuance of that law and are in the hands of third parties, you cannot go behind the face of the bond to inquire into the facts attending their issue.

I will call the attention of the House to one or two cases; one in 14 Wallace, the City of Lexington against Butler. In that case the law under which the bonds were issued required before they could be rightfully issued that there should be a vote of the people authorizing their issue. There was such a vote, but it was coupled with the express condition that until $1,000,000 were furnished from other sources the bonds were not to be issued, and the city denied the authority to issue them under that condition, the $1,000,000 not having been subscribed. Nevertheless the bonds were issued in despite of the vote of the people, in despite of that protest; and they were taken off and placed in the hands of third parties. I can do nothing more than read the syllabus of the case. The court say:

Admitted as it is that the corporation defendants possessed the power to subscribe for the stock and to issue the bonds, it is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon the merits, as the repeated decisions of this court have established the rule that when a corporation has power under any circumstances to issue negotiable securities the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and that they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper.

Why, sir, I have here before me a case in 16 Wallace where the justice of a county court in one of the Western States, without any authority from the people, simply because there was a statute which authorized the issue of bonds under certain circumstances, went to the city of New York and there had a seal manufactured purporting to be the seal of his county, and he issued the bonds in the city of New York, signed by him as presiding justice of the court, affixing to them this manufactured seal; and the Supreme Court sustained the validity of the bonds.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?
Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Certainly.
Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will remember that that case was decided by a divided court, and that it was held by the majority that the justice acted within the express provisions of the law. But the court was divided, and the dissenting opinion in that case is one of the most vigorous protests against the policy of sanctioning bonds issued under such circumstances.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. The gentleman's explanation does not change the law or the result. I simply referred to that to show to what extent the Supreme Court has gone in upholding the validity of these securities. In other words, the Supreme Court now by repeated decisions, followed by all the subordinate tribunals of the country, attach the same importance, the same sanctity, and the same dignity to this class of bonds as they do to commercial paper; and when they get into the hands of third parties you cannot go back and inquire whether the facts existed authorizing their issue, provided there was in the first place a law which, under any circum-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.
Mr. BUCKNER. I will extend it for a few minutes longer.
Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I desire only a few minutes. No sir, if it were possible by any action on our part to ascertain the fact that any of the bonds outstanding of this District were issued beyond the authority given in this statute, or for purposes, in other words, not contemplated by it, and if it were possible to find those bonds in the hands of parties affected with notice, no man in this House would more willingly give assistance to such good work than myself. But in my judgment the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] is simply impracticable; in other words, it will amount to nothing; it will simply have the effect to delay and defer the necessary legislation provided for in the bill, because the bill as it is reported, and for which our votes are now invited, proposes to destroy the power of this board to issue additional bonds, puts a stop to it, and every day we delay the matter we leave it in the power of the District officials to perpetrate frauds on the District and the Government. If, therefore, for no other reason, for this one golden provision in destroying the board of audit, it would command my support. It also withdraws the power to issue any more bonds. It stops the increase of debt. My experience and judgment is that there is no other complete remedy for the evils of bonded debts and bond frauds than to take away and destroy absolutely by positive legislation the power to issue bonds for any purpose.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]
Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish to say once for all that I am not a lawyer; and my excuse for making that remark must be found in the fact that a very respectable and intelligent gentleman asked me the other day how many years I had been in practice. I presume it will never be necessary for me to say again that I have never practiced law at all. But I suppose I should be regarded as a competent juryman in this case, and I wish to say that having read the law carefully and all the laws relating to this question, and having followed the debate upon it in this House and at the other end of the Capitol, so far as my judgment is concerned and in so far as I am a competent so far as my judgment is concerned and in so far as I am a competent juryman, I regard it as a disgrace that the payment of this interest has been so long delayed. I see no reasonable pretext for it. I believe, sir, that the Government is as thoroughly committed to it in law as it is committed to pay the interest upon any other bonds issued, and I regard any proposition here to amend the bill as simply in its effect calculated to perpetuate as long as it continues the disgrace that rests upon the Government.

Now, sir, we have gentlemen here who talk of converting the entire national debt into 3.65 bonds, and here we have 3.65 bonds issued by the Government, selling for 67 or 70 or 71 according to the debates by the Government selling for 67 or 70 or 71, according to the debates in this House. It is time, sir, that this was done away with; and every hour, in my judgment, that we delay in passing this bill or agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, we do ourselves discredit and are bringing discredit upon our Government. I hope that there will be a definite proposition here to repudiate these bonds absolutely, or that we shall agree to the report of the commit-tee. Let us not dally with the question like children any longer. It is high time we approached the question incerely. If these bonds have not been legally issued let us say so, and go to the country on that point. If they have been legally issued, as I believe they have, and as the highest officers of the Government believe they have, and as the other branch of Congress believe they have, I say let us pay the interest and have done with it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I have a very words to say in addition to what I have already said on the question of these bonds, and I can say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] or to any other gentleman who is interested in the subject of the Government not being bound for the payment of interest or principal of the bonds legally issued, as they put it, that I should rejoice as much as any one if I could see any escape of the government of the District of Columbia from the payment of these bonds, bonds which the gentleman says were illegally issued. But, sir, as a lawyer, and from the investigation I have given to this question, I believe with my colleague from Missouri [Mr. Philips] that there is not any possibility of the Government escaping from its obligation under the law enacted in June, 1874.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentlemant allow me to state a proposition?

Mr. BUCKNER. O, yes; certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. It is admitted, I think, on all hands that if the bonds are in the hands of innocent holders we are liable. Assuming that to be admitted, what harm can there be in your passing the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] which would only affect those bonds if in the hands of persons with guilty knowledge? I must say that it seems to me the committee stubbornly resist every effort made to protect the Government from the payment of bonds which are in the hands of guilty parties. That is what we want to get at by this proviso.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is that very proposition that makes me desire to say a word or two. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLY-

MER] as well as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] place the committee, whether intentionally or otherwise, in a false position be-Government to pay bonds illegally issued. As to the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] wishes to incorporate in the bill, I wish to say that there are no bonds, as far as the matter has come within my knowledge, that have been illegally issued by the authorities authorized by law. They have been issued in every respect in accordance with the law, and the sinking-fund commissioners who have issued these bonds have been in precise accordance with the law, dotting every i and crossing every t. And therefore there can be no pretense that any of these bonds in the hands of third parties can be defeated by any legislation that Congress may

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask another question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.
Mr. CLYMER. Does the gentleman undertake to say from his knowledge acquired as the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, of the investigation made by it, that none of these bonds have been issued except in strict compliance with the terms of the original act of 1874? Have they not been issued in vast quan-tities for purposes never contemplated by that act, for fraudulent puroses ? And yet by his action he covers them up.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman either misstates the facts or he is ignorant of them.

Mr. CLYMER. I neither misstate the facts nor am I ignorant of

Mr. BUCKNER. I think he is mistaken in the facts of the case. I said just now, and I repeat it, and I desire to emphasize the statement, that there are none of these bonds that have been illegally issued. Let it be remembered that the sinking-fund commissioners for the District of Columbia issued these bonds upon the certificates presented by the board of audit; and that under the law they had no authority to inquire whether the certificates were properly and honestly issued or not. They have no authority in the matter; they are mere clerks to do what Congress required them to do; that was to issue bonds whenever certificates from the board of audit were presented in sums of $50 or $500. They were required to do that and nothing more.

The whole difficulty grows out of the fact that the board of audit, not the sinking-fund commissioners—as I expect to show this House at the proper time—have exceeded their authority. That is the point. They have exceeded their authority by certifying for purposes which they should not have certified. The sinking-fund commissioners have not exceeded their authority in issuing the bonds, because they had no authority to inquire as to whether these certificates were proper or improper, whether they were necessary or otherwise; they had no authority whatever in that respect.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will.

Mr. CLYMER. When my friend says that the board of audit have issued these certificates improperly—

Mr. BUCKNER. Have exceeded their authority.
Mr. CLYMER. Does he mean to say that they have exceeded their authority by issuing certificates for matters that they were not authorized by the act to issue them for?

Mr. BUCKNER. I think so; that is the conclusion to which I have come. I think the board of audit had no authority to issue any certificates except for indebtedness, liquidated or unliquidated, existing on the 20th of June, 1874.

Mr. CLYMER. Just here will my friend permit me to interrupt him ?

Mr. BUCKNER. Very well.
Mr. CLYMER By the seventh section of the act of 1874, the sinking-fund commissioners were enjoined as follows:

And said commissioners shall use all necessary means for the prevention of any unauthorized or fraudulent issue of any of such bonds.

Mr. CLYMER. I am perfectly well aware that the board of audit alone could issue the certificates upon which the sinking-fund commissioners were afterward to issue the bonds. Now the gentleman admits that the board of audit did issue certificates upon fraudulent claims. I say it was the duty of the sinking-fund commissioners to inquire whether the board of audit had issued fraudulent certificates upon which they were to base their action afterward.

Mr. BUCKNER. I undertake to say that that statute will bear no such interpretation at all; they had no such authority in the premises.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the geutleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. The sixth section of the act of 1874 provides

That it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works, hereinafter specified, namely: first, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates; secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the anditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works; fifthly, claims for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or on behalf of the District of Columbia; sixthly, all claims for private property taken by the board of public works from the avenues, streets, and alleys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; and, seventhly, all unadjusted claims for damages that may have been presented to the board of public works pursuant to an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, entitled "An act providing for the payment of damages sustained by reason of public improvements or repairs," approved June 20, 1872, which last-named claims shall severally be examined and audited without regard to any examination heretofore made, &c.

Now I desire to ask my friend if there was any certificate issued for any indebtedness that is not included within the specifications of that section? If there was any certificate issued for that which the law did not authorize them to issue certificates for, were the sinkingfund commissioners compelled to issue bonds for them? think they were not, for they were obliged, by the seventh section of the same law, to look into these certificates and see if they were issued in accordance with the authority vested in the board of audit, then are those bonds valid?

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is mistaken as to the sinking-fund commissioners having any authority or power in reference to the matter, except that they were to see that no forged or unauthorized bonds were issued. They had no judicial power or power to determine whether these certificates were properly issued under that law, for that belonged alone and exclusively to the board of audit, and the sinking-fund commissioners had no option but to issue bonds upon the certificates as they were presented.

Mr. TUCKER. At the end of the seventh section there is this provision:

And the said sinking-fund commissioners are hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par for like sums of any class of indebtedness in the preceding section named, including sewer taxes, &c.

Now the only power of the sinking-fund commissioners, as I read this provision, is to exchange the bonds authorized by the seventh section for like sums of any class of indebtedness named in the sixth section, but not for like sums of any class of indebtedness not named in the sixth section.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let me say that every certificate bore upon its face the evidence that it did belong to one of these classes. I have here one of those certificates and it is in this form:

This certifies that upon examination of audit of claim No. -

That is one of the classesthere is found to be due to the sum of on account of contract work.

So that all these certificates appear to belong to one or another of these seven classes and to no other class. The sinking-fund commissioners were not authorized to go beyond that. It was none of their business to inquire whether the board of audit had exceeded their authority. And the bonds having been issued and having gone into the hands of third persons, I say the Government is responsible under that act.

There is another reason. These bonds, as I said on a former occasion, are made up upon claims of different classes: the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh. Large portions of them are perfectly legitimate and honest; some of them may have been issued in excess of their authority. But I would like to know how the Government is going to undertake to find out what part of these bonds is fraudulent, and in respect to what part the commissioners exceeded their authority. The thing is an utter impossibility. You might just as well go down to the Potomac and undertake to separate and identify the waters that flow from its several branches.

Gentlemen say, "Wait till we can investigate." We are investigating; but our investigations can lead to no other result, in my judgment, than that the Government is bound under the obligations of the act of 1874 to provide for the payment of these bonds.

Mr. SAVAGE. What is the use of spending time in investigation, if nothing can be done?

Mr. BUCKNER. Why, sir, perhaps we may be able to find some men who have violated the law and to take measures for their punishment, so as to make an example for the future. We want to see how this thing has been done, who is responsible for it; and if there is anybody that is responsible the committee will endeavor to hold them accountable. That is what we propose to do; and that is as far as this investigation can accomplish anything.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a question? Admitting all that the gentleman has said, does he not think that it would still be prudent on the part of Congress to declare in this joint resolution that the Government assumes no greater responsibility for the debt of this District, whether lawfully or unlawfully created, than that which has already been assumed? That, because by the act of 1874 we directed the payment of interest on the bonds issued under that act, Congress does not mean by this to assume any responsibility beyond that already created? My friend will remember that the liability assumed by the Government in the act of 1874 is at furthest simply that of a guarantor; that is to say, it assumes the obligation of imposing necessary taxation on the District of Columbia to provide for the payment of this interest and ultimately the payment of the principal. Now, I am apprehensive that the construction placed upon this resolution may be that the Government by implication assumes liability for the payment of this debt. I want to guard against the possibility of any such construction by simply inserting in the resolution a declaration that nothing in the act shall be construed to create a liability on the part of the Government of the United States to pay the interest and principal of these bonds.

Mr. BUCKNER. There are two very good reasons—

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL.) The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] that but one minute of his boar is left. minute of his hour is left.

Mr. BUCKNER. In answer to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] I will merely say that this resolution does not commit the Government at all to the payment of this money out of the funds of the United States. It merely directs the District com-missioners to pay the interest out of money belonging to the District appropriations heretofore made.

I now call the previous question upon the motion to adopt the report of the committee of conference

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.
Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should refuse to adopt this report, can we not then ask for a further conference on this bill and the amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it will be competent to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope then that the House will not agree to the report, but will let it be recommitted to the same committee.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report, there were-ayes 78, noes 63.

Mr. CLYMER. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this is voted down, a motion will then be made to commit the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the same com-

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Does it go back to the committee of conference without further motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in the power of the House if this report be rejected to ask for further conference.

Mr. PAGE. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri made a parliamentary inquiry and he has the right to a reply.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 82, not voting 99; as follows:

So the conference report was adopted.

During the vote, Mr. HENDEE stated that his colleague, Mr. JOYCE, who was absent on account of sickness, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PLATT stated that his colleague, Mr. Adams, who was absent by leave of the House, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPLAINT OF TEXAN APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask leave to present the memorial of certain citizens of Texas, complaining of the unjust and illegal manner in which that State is apportioned for the election of Representatives in Congress. I do not myself know personally the facts stated, but the memorial comes to me from a highly respectable and responsible source, and I take pleasure in presenting it. I move that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Elections.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DEPRECIATED SILVER COIN.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That, as the constantly increasing production of silver and the discontinuance of its use as money in sums greater than the equivalent of ten American dollars in any one payment by most of the commercial nations has so far reduced its value that United States legal-tender notes and fractional currency will purchase more gold than will silver coin of a like denomination, it is the sense of this House that the issue of gold-interest-bearing bonds for the purchase of silver and its manufacture into coin is an unwise and wasteful expenditure of public revenue, and should be discontinued.

The House refused to suspend the rules, (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. KELLEY. I move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. It ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations, as that committee has already considered the subject and reported unanimously.

Mr. KELLEY. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

PITTSBURGH CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. RANDALL moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill; but yielded to

Mr. HOPKINS, who, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the testimony taken and the report of investigation recently made under his direction relative to alleged illegal charges and irregularities in the management of the custom-house at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be further requested to report to this House what action he took in reference to the change of office at said custom-house and the reason why such change was not made.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. FORT. I rise to a question of order. I would like to know by what rule of the House one gentleman can take the floor and yield it out to others?

Mr. RANDALL. By the rule of politeness.
The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox in the chair.) Such has been the usage of the House.
Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions which lution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the House as to the present condition and proportion of life-saving stations on the ocean and lake coasts; second, whether the compensation to the captains and crews of life-saving stations is sufficient to procure suitable persons for this important and perilous duty; third, whether any and what changes in the law are necessary to promote greater efficiency and success in the life-saving service.

Mr. RANDALL. I will now withdraw my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, as the hour is so late.

COTTON CLAIMS.

Mr. WILLIS. I send to the desk a resolution, on which I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Pending the reading of the resolution, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WILLIS. Let the resolution be read. Mr. O'BRIEN. I will hear the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to transmit to this House a list of all the cotton claims presented to and paid by his Department from January, 1865, up to the present time; also, the names of the original owners and their places of residence, together with the names and places of residence of the attorneys employed in each case, and any information he, the Secretary of the Treasury, may have in his possession in regard to the manner ef paying fees in such cases; and also whether he knows or has any information concerning the existence of any combinations formed to defraud the Government in relation to such claims, and, if so, what such knowledge or information is.

The resolution was adopted.

J. W. WRIGHT AND A. CLAPPERTON.

Mr. WILLIS. I also send to the desk a preamble and resolution for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, in December, 1871, John W. Wright and Alexander Clapperton, formerly United States pension agents, were indicted in the United States court for the southern district of New York, for conspiracy to defraud the United States, and for other crimes, and under an opinion of Solictor-General B. H. Bristow, a suit has been brought and is now pending in the United States court of this District to recover the sum of $100,000 upon the bond of said Wright; and whereas, after it had been determined to prosecute these cases during the present month, it is found that the officer having charge of them for the past three years was summarily dismissed the night previous to his intended departure for the Indian Territory to procure the Government witnesses, and the name of a confederate of said Wright, one William P. Ross, was immediately afterward presented to the United States Senate as agent for the Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminole Indians upon whom the alleged frauds were committed, and that William Nicholson, who assisted in the payment of attorneys' fees referred to in the House of Representatives report No. 39, February 25, 1871, has recently been appointed superintendent of Indian affairs: Therefore,

Be itresolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and are hereby, instructed to send for persons and papers, to examine into and report upon the facts in these cases, and to take such action and make such recommendations as may be deemed necessary in the premises.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would suggest that the words "it is alleged that" be inserted to qualify the statements in the pream-

Mr. WILLIS. I will modify the preamble in that way. There being no objection, the preamble and resolution, as modified, were adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to offer a resolution. Mr. FORT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FORT. I call for a division.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays. I hope my resolution is not to be disposed of in this summary manner.

Several Members. No debate.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] insist on a division?

Mr. FORT. I do.

The House divided; and there were ayes 121, noes not counted. So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLAINE: The petition of a convention of colored people of Texas, January 14, 1876, representing that the proposed new constitution deprives the colored people of their school privileges, violates the reconstruction act in this respect, and proposes to devote the agricultural-land grant to the education of whites alone, to the Committee on the Indicions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of John A. Mohr, of Virginia, proposing a solution of the financial troubles of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MAXEY. I present the petition of Benjamin A. Botts, Miely Porter & Co., W. J. Hutchens, T. W. House, and others, citizens of the city of Houston, Texas, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law. I am personally acquainted with a number of the signers, and among them I recognize wealthy and enlightened merchants, distinguished lawyers, and prominent bankers; and I am satisfied that they are exponents of the sentiments of the city of Houston on this question. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judi-

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented a remonstrance of the Board of Trade and other organizations of Philadelphia, against the change in the Light-House Board of the United States contemplated in Senate bill No. 373, or any other change therein; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying such action on the part of Congress as will speedily cause to be released from unjust imprisonment one Edward O'Meagher Condon, who fought for the Union during the late war, and who is now confined in a British dungeon, and has been for eight years, under life sentence; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented five petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, soldiers in the late war, praying the passage of a law granting to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, and their heirs, a bounty of eight and a third dollars per month for the time served, deducting all United States bounty heretofore paid; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a letter from the Attorney-General, inclosing a copy of a communication from Mrs. L. J. Wassan to the President of the United States relative to the treatment of United States prisoners in the penitentiary in Georgia; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON. I present the petition of Eden H. Fisher, of Rome City, Indiana, praying for an increase of pension. I beg leave to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions especially to this memorial. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I present the petition of 1843 soldiers of the late war and Mexican war, inmates at the National Soldiers' Home in the State of Ohio, representing to Congress the case of Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of the United States, and once their faithful soldier; one who fought gallantly for the Union during the late war, but is one who fought gallantly for the Union during the late war, but is now and has been over eight years past confined in a British prison under life sentence of imprisonment. They say:

Whereas most satisfactory proofs exist to show that the conviction of said Edward O Meagher Condon was procured under the influence of vengeful passion and by the testimony of prejudiced witnesses, so that he is all these years the suffering victim of misdirected revenge, therefore we, your humble petitiquers, most respectfully approach your honorable body asking you to take such action as to your body shall seem best for the relief of said Edward O'Meagher Condon, and for his speedy release from unjust imprisonment.

I wish briefly to state the facts of this case. This young man, after the close of the late civil war, went to England, and was charged with being engaged in what was called the Fenian riot at Manchester. He was tried and convicted, his friends say by improper, prejudiced, and unreliable testimony. His case appealed so strongly to the best feelings of his friends that they made efforts to obtain a mitigation of his sentence, and the Department of State has frequently, through our minister at London, interposed its good offices with the British government to procure for him a pardon or commutation of his sentence. So far the efforts of the Government have been unavail-

I suppose the object of this petition, which certainly comes from a source entitling it to great respect, which bears the signatures of over eighteen hundred men who served with Condon in our war, and who testify to his good character and his excellence as a man-the object of this petition is to add weight, if possible add the weight of Congress to the appeal of the Executive, with the hope that the effort may prove successful and induce the British government to exercise elemency toward this young man, who, I am told is in a state of health which will make a much longer confinement bring him to a prema-

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the hope that they may be able to devise something that may tend to promote the object sought by the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented 22 petitions of citizens of the United States soldiers in the late war, praying the passage of an act granting to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, or their heirs, a bounty soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, or their heirs, a bounty of eight and one-third dollars per month for the entire time served, deducting all United States bounties heretofore paid; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John Long and 57 others, soldiers of the late war, now residents of Armstrong County, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a law granting to soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, and their heirs, a bounty of eight and one-third dollars per month for the time served, deducting all United States bounties heretofore paid; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. tee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, (S. No. 591,) to regulate the transportation of bonded merchandise withdrawn from warehouse.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1488) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of N. D. Clark, C. A. Clark, and J. L. Bartlett, citizens of Colusa County, California, praying to be granted title to five sections of unsurveyed public lands near the headwaters of the sulphur creek known as Empire Springs, in that State, whereon to establish an industrial college, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was correctly agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of so amending the law for the entry of homestead lands as to permit soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphans, to make entry of such lands through agents, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 700) to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 125) to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, it being in the same language as the bill previously reported, and it was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 592) referring the claim of J. Snowden & Son and Snowden & Mason to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 593) for the relief of the heirs of James S. Ham; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of the heirs of John W. Vose; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 595) to establish a post-route in Oregon and Idaho Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 596) to incorporate the National Surgical Institute of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 597) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington," approved February 14, 1865; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 598) to authorize Spencer F. Baird, assistant Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to receive from the King of Sweden a diploma and decoration, constituting him a member of the Royal Norwegian Order of St. Olaf, the same being a literary and scientific order; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 599) granting a pension to Catharine A. Winslow, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Winslow; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That Isaacs, Taylor & Williams have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their memorial and accompanying papers.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. INGALLS. If there be no further morning business, I move that the remainder of the morning hour be devoted to the consider-ation of cases on the Calendar to which there is no objection, subject

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that we commence at the beginning of the Calendar, instead of where we last left off.

Mr. INGALLS. I think we should commence at the point where the consideration of the Calendar was last suspended.

Mr. SARGENT. There was one bill passed over on a former call of the Calendar which will probably only take a moment. It was explained before and objection was made temporarily by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Edmunds.] I understand he has no further objection, and I should like to have that bill considered.

Mr. NIGALLS. The Senator can move to proceed to its considered.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator can move to proceed to its consider-

Mr. SARGENT. I will then move that Senate bill No. 130 be taken up and considered at the present time

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interests of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in line 8 after the word "successors" to insert "assigns, and;" so as to read:

Relinquished and granted to the said city and county and its successors, assigns, and vendees," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that the word "grant" is used in the bill in two or three places, which, as lawyers understand, implies a conveyance of a title, and in a certain sense implies a warranty. We have had so much difficulty in respect of claims made upon us by citizens in that vicinity hitherto that I think we ought to use some language which will exclude positively the idea that the United States undertakes to guarantee anything to anybody or to be responsible to anybody for anything in connection with this appropriation of public property.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator refer to line 7:

And the same are hereby relinquished and granted to the said city and county.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.
Mr. SARGENT. I think the word "relinquished" would be sufficient. I move to strike out the words "and granted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "granted" occurs again in line 23

Mr. SARGENT. That refers to a public highway: Said eighty feet being granted for a public highway or street.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that would carry a warranty of title and would imply possibly that if we should need it for military use in some great public emergency we should have to pay the city some-

Mr. SARGENT. I think the word "relinquished" would be sufficient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes it an acquittance instead of a grant.
Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out "granted" and insert "relinquished," in the twenty-third line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. In-GALLS] moves that the Senate proceed during the residue of the morn-ing hour to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar, beginning at the point where the last call stopped. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under this call, the first bill reached is the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States

Mr. SARGENT. I object to the consideration of that bill.
Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator will withdraw his objection. That bill was reported at the last session by a unanimous vote of the committee and at this session also. I do not see why we might not dispose of it now as well as at any other time.

Mr. SARGENT. I object because I think the President's salary is

Mr. SARGENT. I object because I think the President's salary is not too high. I object because I am opposed to any legislation that will tend to reduce it. The salary, even at the present rate, is reasonably low, considering the expense and cost of the office to the incumbent. I propose to object now and at any subsequent time when I have an opportunity; and if the bill comes up notwithstanding my objection, I shall vote against it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will inquire whether it would be in order to move to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not be according to the understanding. The Chair will observe to the Senator from Iowa that the motion was to consider cases not objected to. There being an objection, this bill will go over.

DECORATION TO ADMIRAL ALMY.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes Rear-Admiral Almy to accept a decoration of the order of Kamehameha I, which has been tendered him by the King of the Hawaiian Islands as an evidence of his appreciation of that officer.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amend-ment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESENT TO EDWIN JAMES.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes Edwin James, United States consular agent at San José, to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain a piece of plate which she desires to present to him as a recognition of his courageous and efficient services rendered in support of J. Magee, the British vice-consul, when his life was threatened by the commandant of San José.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORGANIZATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 75) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States permitting national banks to organize with a capital of $50,000 in towns irre spective of population.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill was introduced by me, and placed on the Calendar at my request. I am of opinion, however, that with the opposition of the Comptroller of the Currency and the adverse report of the Committee on Finance it would be very difficult indeed to secure its passage. In order to clear the Calendar, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

J. M. THOMPSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 163) for the relief of J. M. Thompson, late captain First South Carolina Volunteers, (afterward Thirty-third United States Colored Troops.) It is a direction to the Secretary of War to recognize John Milton Thompson as a second lieutenant First South Carolina Volunteers from November a second lieutenant First South Carolina Volunteers from November 28, 1862, he having been commissioned and mustered as such by General Rufus Saxton, military governor and commanding forces in South Carolina, and served in that capacity with his company in active operations against the enemy; but no expenditure from the Treasury is to follow the passage of the act other than that already made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean, Mr. President? [A pause.] I do not insist upon my right to have the President tell me. I think the bill had better go over, if there is nobody to explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] made the report, and perhaps he can explain it.

Mr. SPENCER. There is a printed report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, which was submitted by Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 29th of February last:

of February last:

of February last:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 163) for the relief of J. M. Thompson, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The proof shows that J. M. Thompson was appointed a second lieutenant in the First Regiment of South Carolina Volunteers on the 28th day of November, 1862, and ordered to report forthwith for duty; that he was afterward commissioned as such second lieutenant, to rank from that date, and that he immediately entered on and continued in active service. It is now claimed that he was illegally paid the compensation of a second lieutenant from the 28th of November, 1862, to the 31st day of January, 1863, his regiment not having been full to the minimum until that date, and, unless he is relieved by the passage of this bill, the amount which is claimed to have been illegally paid him will be withheld from his pay as first lieuterant in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, the position which he now holds.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should it not be withheld? If he was paid ontrary to law, why should he be allowed to keep the mone? The Committee on Military Affairs are in the habit of relieving officers under such circumstances. Many such bills pass at every session of Congress, paying officers who served when their regiments were not full to the minimum. This officer did draw his pay at the time. Now his pay in the Army is being stopped, and it seems a hardship that we should depart in his case from a rule which has been applied for years and years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know personally of my own knowledge of a whole brigade that was organized with the understanding that the pay of the officers as officers would commence from the time the force was organized, and yet they did not receive it until the force was mustered into the service, although they were nominally of the rank they subsequently held. To allow the payment of a claim like this would probably open the door to innumerable cases all over the

Mr. SPENCER. This does not open the door. The door has been opened a long time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is a bad precedent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator from Alabama show us any law like this, which has ever passed? Of course, there are thousands of instances of this character, undoubtedly.

Mr. SPENCER. I cannot now, but if the bill goes over until tomorrow I can look up the precedents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a thing we ought not to do unless in extreme cases; but, if it is the settled rule to do it, I do not stand here to object to this one gentleman. I think we ought to find out whether we have done it before, and I think the bill ought to go over.

Mr. WEST. I cannot at the present moment recall to mind any particular instance of like action to this; but I am satisfied that such has been had by the Senate and by Congress; and it arises from the fact that in the earlier stages of the war officers were not required to be mustered in before they were paid. Although perhaps this case does not come under such an application, yet there were, and we have acted upon, a great many instances where officers without a due and full knowledge of the law rendered service to the Government, and where the remissness, if any, existed on the part of the Government itself in not properly mustering the officer in at the date that he rendered service to the Government. We have had such instances over dered service to the Government. We have had such instances over and over again, and on proper investigation we have always given the officers relief, provided it was shown to the satisfaction of the Senate that they did render due service to the Government during that period. This seems to me to be one of those cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yesterday a case was passed on the report of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] which seemed to me perfectly registrates.

meritorious. There was a case where an officer was actually promoted and was not mustered in for some six or seven months afterward, because he was in the presence of the enemy and engaged in battle and actually wounded. A case of that kind I think is clear.

This is a case somewhat parallel to that. nothing of it, not being on the committee, except that I know that there were such instances, over and over again, of men who gallantly served their country for months and for a year perhaps, where proper recognition was not taken of that service. Now when the facts are committed here to the investigation and cognizance of the Committee on Military Affairs, and they report back that this man did serve the Government during that period and that his pay was withheld and is being withheld from him, I think it is a case that the Senate can take cognizance of in equity and act favorably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difference between that case and the case that my friend speaks of is this: The law did not allow this regiment to have an officer of that grade; but, in spite of the law, they made him an officer of that grade. That is the case as it is stated in the report of the committee. He having been an officer in spite of the law and against it—instead of having failed to be mustered in because he was doing service, through some fault or defect in the or-ganization or the operations of the Government—the cases are enganization or the operations of the Government—the cases are entirely different; and, unless we have established the rule of paying all persons who were mustered into the service contrary to law, with a rank that they had no right to hold, we ought not to begin by establishing the rule in this case. It is true that in this particular case the sum is very small indeed; the discussion has probably cost the Government more while we have been talking about it than the whole sum of money; but it establishes a rule.

Mr. SPENCER. My recollection is that the officer was mustered into the service and did perform these duties.

into the service and did perform these duties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that he did; but, according to the report of the committee, he performed them against the law. He had no right to be an officer of that kind, and the pay of this increased grade he ought not to have had. He got it, however; and now, if Congress establishes the rule that in all cases of illegal promotions they will pay the price attached to the promotion just as if it had been a legal promotion, of course we ought not to make an exception of this gentleman. We must deal with uniformity, but I think we ought to look it up and see what the precedents are.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senate will consent to allow the bill to go over, we will look at the precedents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over by common consent. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

WILLIAM BOWLIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Bowlin.

Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. CLAYTON. This bill passed the Senate at the last session and failed on account of want of time in the other House.

Mr. SPENCER. There was a report made during the last Congress.
Mr. CLAYTON. I know it was reported during the last Congress and passed the Senate at that time.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Spen-CER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 31st of March,

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 344) for relief of William Bowlin, having had the same under consideration, submit the fol-relief of William Bowlin, having had the same under consideration, storage lowing report:

The proof shows that William Bowlin was sworn into service with his company, as captain, Company I., Second Arkans Cavalry, October 10, 1863, and performed duty as such, under orders of Colonel J. E. Phelps, commanding said regiment, but was not able to secure muster until March 8, 1864, the mustering officer declining to date muster back to October 10, 1863. The bill is to provide payment for such services for the intervening time.

Captain Bowlin recruited his company under orders and reported same, entering upon duty with eighty-four men October 10, 1863; was responsible for property, and the fault of non-muster was not chargeable to him. The committee recommend passage of the bill.

mend passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it my duty to object to cases of that kind unless the report shows specifically the reasons why the officer was not mustered in as if in the presence of the enemy under circumstances which prevented him.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not know that the report shows that, but the fact was that this man was serving in the Indian country and he could not be mustered in because there was no mustering officer there.

have passed such bills in other cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. That fact ought to appear on the face of the report, but the report simply says that he was not mustered in, and the law is express that the pay must date from the mustering in. If he was prevented from being mustered in by being in the presence of the enemy or being where he could not be mustered in by reasonable diligence under circumstances that would justify an exception, it ought to be made, but I do not think it ought to be made unless the report shows what the circumstances are.

Mr. CLAYTON. The report says he could not be mustered, but does not give the reasons in detail. I did not make the report. The facts are that he could not be mustered in. Those facts were established to the satisfaction of the committee when it considered the case.

Mr. SPENCER. This bill passed the Senate last year.
Mr. LOGAN. Let the report be read.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be again read.
The Secretary again read the report.
Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator from Ohio in objecting to this bill falls into an error. The report clearly shows that this man had a full company, and that they were entitled to be mustered. fact that there was no mustering officer present was certainly not the fault of this officer; but he was mustered in to this extent: his muster-roll was made out and he was sworn into the service. as far as he could go, and he entered on the duty and performed the duty. The mustering officer under the law has no right to date the muster back. But where an officer is sworn into the service, and where there is a vacancy that he can fill, and he is unable to be muswhere there is a vacancy that he can fill, and he is unable to be mustered, he certainly is as much entitled to pay as if he had been mustered, where he has performed the duty. There were a great many instances during the war where persons could not be mustered in at all. For instance, I know many officers really of regiments commissioned, sworn into the service, performing their duty perhaps for twelve months without meeting a mustering officer. Sometimes the mustering officer would be to the rear; sometimes one could not be found; and very often persons went into battle and were killed who were not mustered, who were really officers performing the duties of their office. There is no reason in the world why they should not have the pay of the office they actually held. have the pay of the office they actually held.

In the case which has gone over the report does not show that the company had the requisite number of soldiers to make a company; but here the report does show that it had. It had eighty-four, pany; but here the report does show that it had. It had eighty-four, and they were sworn into service, performed the duty; and it was not the officer's fault that he could not be mustered. The report does not state specifically why he could not be mustered. But I know enough about such things to be perfectly satisfied that it was because there was no mustering officer there, and therefore it was no fault of the officer. I think in a case of this kind it is clearly the duty of the Government to pay the officer who performed the duty as much as if he had been mustered forty times. I could give instances, so far as I am concerned myself, in reference to being mustered into service. I was not mustered into service when I was sworn into service first. was not mustered into service when I was sworn into service first. There was a reason for it which it is not necessary to mention; but thousands of instances of that kind occurred where the duty was performed; and it is perfectly correct to pay them as if they had had a mustering officer right there to muster them into service. But where there was not, where the regiment had not the requisite number and it was a field-officer, or where the company had not the requisite number and it was a company officer, then I say the law is very clear that he could not be mustered, and hence would not be entitled to the pay.

That is a very clear proposition. But where the company or regiment had the number to entitle it to muster and performed the duty, and it was no fault of the officer, the Government owes him the pay just as much as if it had had a thousand mustering officers present.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was mistaken in stating that this officer served in the Indian country. He served in Arkansas, in one of those regiments that were raised from that State, I think in 1862; and there ments that were raised from that State, I think in 1862; and there was a great deal of irregularity in the raising of those regiments from the native element of Arkansas at that time. In fact, there was a great deal of difficulty attending the raising of those regiments. This company was raised by General Curtis, who was in command of that country. The difficulties of getting a mustering officer were very great. The committee was satisfied at the time, upon the examination of the papers, that this officer could not be mustered.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to William Bowlin late of Company L. Second Arkansas for paying to William Bowlin, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry from the 10th of October, 1863, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period as an enlisted

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill stands on a motion to reconsider; and, as it will probably give rise to some debate, I suggest that it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN G. PARR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John G. Parr, late a lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and thirty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to pay him a pension as of the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CITIZENS' BUILDING COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with an amendment, which was in line 9 of section 1, to strike out the words "purchase, hold, and convey real and personal estate;" in line 11 after the word "exercise" to strike out "all" and insert "such;" in line 13 to strike out the words "and such especially;" so as to read:

That John C. McKelden, T. L. Tullock, B. F. Bigelow, Samuel Emery, M. Ashford, Frank M. Green, J. G. Judd, E. G. Davis, John Fraser, B. F. Fuller, Charles Bradley, C. C. Duncanson, W. B. Morgan, and their associates, are hereby created a body politic and corporate by the name of The Citizens Building Company of Washington City, and as such may make contracts, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, may have a corporate seal, and may exercise such other powers incident to corporations and usually enjoyed by them as are requisite to enable them to purchase, take, hold, and convey square 363, in Washington City, District of Columbia, and to improve the same by building dwelling-houses thereon, and to sell and convey them to stockholders or others, for the benefit of the stockholders.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is due to the Senate that some explanation'should be made of a bill which incorporates a company, as I understand, to carry out a speculation or an improvement. to understand from the Senator who reported the bill whether the case is not covered by the general law authorizing corporations in this District or whether there are any reasons for the passage of this special

Mr. INGALLS. I am myself as much opposed to burdening the statute-books with special acts of incorporation, when the result can be secured under the general law, as any person can be; but the second volume of the Revised Statutes referring to the District of Columbia, chapter 18, under the head of "General Incorporation," shows what associations can be incorporated and what not. Under that chapter, "Institutions of learning, religious societies, societies benevolent, educational, manufacturing, agricultural, mining, mechanical, insurance, mercantile, transportation, market and savings-bank corporations, sanitary associations, boards of trade, and railroad companies," can be incorporated. This is an act to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington. Mr. INGALLS. I am myself as much opposed to burdening the stat-can be incorporated. This is an act to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that "mechanical?"

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not fall under the head of "mechanical?"

Mr. INGALLS. I think not. It authorizes a certain number of citizens named therein and their associates to become a body-politic and corporate by the name about recited, for the purpose of improving a certain square of ground which they own in this city. They propose to erect upon that ground a certain number of dwelling-houses which are to be disposed of, and when the improvement of the square is completed and the dwellings sold and the proceeds distributed then the corporate powers cease and the company ceases to exist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any individual liability of the stockholders or directors in any case ?

Mr. INGALLS. They have already erected nine buildings and the provision of the act is that their capital stock shall not exceed $300,000. In response to the question of the Senator from Vermont, I think there is no individual liability of the corporators or stockholders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what are the provisions of the general incorporation act in that respect as to those who may associate under that? In about every private corporation that I know anything of that is incorporated in the States nowadays, there are always careful provisions that the stockholders shall be liable to a certain extent and the directors to a certain other extent in order to protect people who deal with such intangible, invisible, soulless beings as corporations are.

Mr. INGALLS. The general incorporation act under class 4 providing for the incorporation of manufacturing, agricultural, mining, mechanical, insurance, mercantile, transportation, market, and savings-bank corporations, in section 562 declares:

All the stockholders of every company incorporated under this chapter shall be severally individually liable to the creditors of the company in which they are stockholders, to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by them, respectively, for all debts and contracts made by such company.

That provision is omitted in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be in.
Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator thinks that it should be incorpor-

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator thinks that it should be incorporated, I have no objection, and I presume the corporators themselves would have no objection to its being placed in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit to the Senator that it certainly is a wise and necessary provision for the protection of the people who deal with such corporations. I suggest to the Senate whether it would not be well to provide in all these private corporations, as the course is in most of the States, I believe, where there is a special charter, and also where there is a general act, that the corporation and its stockholders shall be liable to all the responsibilities and duties imposed by the general law upon corporations formed under it. stockholders shall be hable to all the responsibilities and duties imposed by the general law upon corporations formed under it. Then they stand on an exact equality. The ground for this bill, as I understand, is that the particular object that the corporation has in view is not embraced in the general statute.

Mr. INGALLS. That is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the case, the simple thing to do, it seems to me, and the right thing, would be to incorporate them, if they are not embraced in the general provision, but subject them to all the provisions of the general law so that they will not gain an advantage over other corporations who may be incorporated under the general law and have special and peculiar advantages better than theirs, and at the same time secure as that statute does, which, I think, is very important, the people who deal with them.

Mr. INGALLS. The committee were very careful to guard this bill as far as possible, in all matters that were suggested to them, and the amendments which were reported by the committee will show that it was their intention to confine the corporation exclusively to the performance of the one act for which they profess a desire to be

Mr. EDMUNDS. But they get credit, nevertheless.
Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me, Mr. President, that the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont is hardly applicable to this bill from the fact they can only contract debts in compliance with the provisions of this act and in carrying out the design for which they are incorporated, and for all the contracts that they may make, for all the material furnished and all the labor that is devoted to the construction of these buildings, the parties so furnishing material or labor, as I understand, will be entitled to a lien on the property, so that there could be no avoidance of liability and no wrong done to any creditors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend on the circumstances under which the labor was done and the materials were furnished. If this corporation goes to a hardware store and buys one thousand kegs of nails, I take it that the hardware dealer would hardly have a lien in the nature of a mechanic's lien upon the house into which those nails might be put.

Mr. INGALLS. He would have a lien for the material furnished if it could be established that it went into the property, I suppose upon the real estate.

the real estate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends upon a variety of circumstances; but even in that case such liens, which are in derogation of the right of the disposal of property and of the rights of purchasers, constitute an ineumbrance and have to be strictly pursued and made good within a certain length of time. That being the state of the case, an innocent creditor from whom this corporation might have borrowed money or bought property would be left entirely in the lurch. They might withdraw all their capital, and do everything that experience has shown private corporations sometimes will do, to the injury of has shown private corporations sometimes will do, to the injury of the people who deal with them on the theory that they are really what they purport to be and have capital. I therefore submit to the honorable Senator that the right thing to do would be to make this corporation, and all other private corporations that we incorporate by special charter, subject in respect of the liabilities of its directors and stockholders and their general duties, to the general provisions of the statute which he has read, and then you secure the public and of the statute which he has read, and then you secure the public and secure equality.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire, Mr. President, what is the necessity of this corporation at all. Here is a capital stock of $300,000 to be expended upon a single-square of ground in this city, and to be expended in erecting buildings to be sold. I do not see why such an enterprise cannot be performed just as well without an act of incorporation as with it. While I am ready to vote for acts of incorporation for all such large enterprises of great responsibility and great liability that no single individual or private association of men is willing to undertake, which pertain to the public good, I do not desire for one to vote for an act of incorporation that has no other element than that of private gain, and upon a scale that is perfectly ment than that of private gain, and upon a scale that is perfectly within the reach of private enterprise.

Then I do not see anything in this bill that requires these parties to close up this particular business at any time. It seems to be a contrivance through the forms of law by which the title to real estate may be held in perpetuity in a single corporation, not to descend by the ordinary rules of the descent of real estate to heirs, but to be held in perpetuity by this corporation, for all that I see in this bill, just as long as they please. There has not been disclosed in the discussion any reason to my mind why we should be here making corporations of this small capital and for these purposes that can be just as well gained if parties are willing to associate themselves together and hold themselves out liable for their contracts, as other individuals and other associations are, and not, behind an artificial creation of law, transact their business and hold out, as the Senator from Vermont has said, a credit upon which innocent parties dealing with them have no said, a credit upon which innocent parties dealing with them have no means of ascertaining to what extent they can reach this original capital which is the basis of the corporation. Unless there shall be some reason disclosed why we should devote ourselves to the creation of artificial beings of this kind, full of mischief in their application to the business of this country, I do not see why we should vote for the bill at all. The country is shingled all over with corporations created by the local legislatures of the States, decided by the courts of the land to be not local in their powers, but capable of reaching from Massachusetts or Connecticut to California. I know a corporation greated in the State of Connecticut with power to hold real estates of the states of connecticut with power to hold real estates of the states of connecticut with power to hold real estates of the states of the states of connecticut with power to hold real estates of the states of the s tion created in the State of Connecticut with power to hold real estate in San Francisco and carry on the business of commerce in Japan and all over the Pacific Ocean.

For one, sir, I am opposed to all that sort of legislation. Private individuals, so far as the enterprise is within the scope of private means and has for its purpose and end solely private gain, should not come to Congress for the creation of an artificial being, behind which they can do that which they can do better, and the public be safer in their doing it, in their own individual capacity.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for this bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 553 of the act authorizing incorporations in the District of Columbia shall be held to extend to and include building associations.

It seems to me the only object of this bill is to enable a company of land speculators to accomplish through a corporation the improvement of a square. That is all right enough. They may build houses. It is well enough to have it incorporated. I have no fear of corporations, as my friend from Massachusetts has; but I think corporations ought to be governed by general laws, just like individuals; that special acts in favor of corporations are wrong. There are very few cases that will justify a special act of incorporation. Building associations are modern inventions, and they are convenient inventions. They are enabled to build cheap houses and good houses, and place it within are enabled to build cheap houses and good houses, and place it within the power of a poor man to get a home at a much more favorable rate than in any other way; because, by building a great number of houses combining modern improvements, they can build much cheaper and sell much cheaper than individuals, and generally on long time. Therefore building associations are generally incorporated in most of the States of the Union; and I see no reason why they should not be included in the general act of incorporation of this District. Such a provision will save us from many applications of this kind; and I think will accomplish the object the Senator from Kansas has in view, and enable this company to go on with their plans, and build and sell houses. They can organize, if this amendment is adopted, under the general law regulating manufacturing and other companies.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business is now in order.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Sherman to strike out in lines 7, 8, and 9 of the third section the words:

In the power of a majority of each House to direct that the main question shall be put.

And insert in lieu thereof:

The duty of each House to put the main question.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That, after such debate has lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know that I have any objection to that amendment. It is possible objections might arise to an electoral vote that the Senate and House might want to consider longer than two that the senate and House might want to consider longer than two hours; but at the same time, as there might be danger of the final determination of the result of the vote being too long delayed, I shall not especially oppose the amendment which will close the debate peremptorily at the end of two hours.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will now be on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper,] which will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the second section it is proposed to insert:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States, in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is it in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wallace] suggested an amendment, and if he does not offer it I wish to offer substantially the same amendment. I offer the following amendment to the amendment, as a substitute for it:

But if the Senate should vote for counting one certificate and the House of Representatives another, the joint meeting of the two Houses shall finally determine which shall be counted, by a vote by States, the representation from each State (including the Senators therefrom) having one vote; but if the representation of any State shall be equally divided its vote shall not be counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the amendment of the Senator from 'ennessee

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is evident that the bill is defective in one respect. The author of the bill himself admits that in a certain contingency this bill will not be operative; that where there are two returns from a State and the House of Representatives votes for accepting one return and the Senate the other, in that event the vote of the State will be lost. It seems to me in a bill of so much importance as this there ought to be no omission of that sort, but that the bill ought to be complete and provide for every contingency that may arise. It is not only the right of Congress to provide for counting the electoral is not only the right of Congress to provide for counting the electoral votes, but it is an imperative duty and we ought to perform that duty. It seems to me that Congress itself is the only body to determine this question. The Constitution provides that where there has been no election by the people the House of Representatives shall decide who shall be President, but the same Constitution provides that where there shall be no election of Vice-President the Senate shall decide who shall be Vice-President. The second article of the Constitution in the second section has this provision. After providing for the election of President by the House, it says: election of President by the House, it says:

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

It seems, then, according to that provision of the Constitution, that in a certain event the Vice-President shall be chosen by the Senate. There is provision for the failure of an election by the electoral college of President and Vice-President; in one event the House elects the President, and in another event the Senate elects the Vice-President. The returns of the election of both officers are embraced in the same certificates. It would seem to me therefore proper, as the election is for both, that the two Houses should be the joint tribunal to determine the question. In that view I think the amendment I have offered is the proper solution of this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Virginia explain to me where he finds the constitutional authority for making this provision or for making the provision proposed by the Senator from Tennessee? What is the nature of the power we are conferring upon one House or upon the two Houses voting together as a consolidated committee? Is it a legislative power, or a judicial power, or what sort of a power? The Constitution, it appears to me, regulates what is to be done on this occasion without conferring any powers upon the House of Representatives or the Senate; or else it provides, as it does here, what shall be done, and then leaves it, as all other questions arising under the Constitution are left, to judicial determination, if any dispute should arise. It seems to me that there is very great difficulty indeed in holding that we have the power by law to say that in case of a dispute about a return on the occasion referred to in the Constitution, the House of Representatives shall determine that dispute. The legal objection to it, to my mind, is just as great as it would be to our saying that the common council of the city of Washington shall determine that dispute. If we have the power to legislate at all otherwise than to regulate the congressional action of the two Houses as independent bodies, as has been the practice hitherto, we have the power, of course, to select who shall be the canvassing board in case of dispute, who shall be the deciding board in case of dispute, who shall be the deciding board in case of dispute, who shall be the deciding board. in case of dispute, in reference to the very act of reaching the result, not in reference to who may have the title afterward, because we do not undertake to dispose of that in any way except as the Constitution does, that the man who has got the most electoral votes—and of course that means legal and constitutional votes—shall be the President dent. Nobody would contend if one was declared by the President of the Senate to have been elected, and it turned out that the returns from half of the States were entirely fabricated and had never been sent by those States were entirely fabricated and had never been sent by those States at all, that the person he so declared to be elected on that day was constitutionally the President, I should suppose. But certainly if you were to say that, it is one thing to say that the Constitution has confided to Congress the congressional power, acting as two independent bodies but concurrently, to dispose of this question; but to say that we may by law (not in the exercise of our function to exercise property appropriate in the conference of the conferen tion to confer powers upon some judicial tribunal described in the Constitution to settle something) confer powers upon a body not judicial and not legislative in a constitutional sense, is to my mind going entirely outside of any authority that we possess.

I therefore, Mr. President, without going into the practical inequal-therefore, Mr. Frestein, without going into the practical inequalities and temptations that would exist in respect of either of these amendments, vote against them both upon the ground that, as it appears to me, they are plainly in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall propose an amendment when the proper time comes, which I will now read:

If the two Houses shall not agree, the difference shall be immediately referred to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, whose decision shall be final. If the Chief Justice is absent or unable to attend, the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court present in the Capitol or other place of meeting shall act in his place.

This is a judicial question; a question of law and of fact; but judicial, whether of fact or law; and it seems to me that there is a propriety in referring it to the presiding officer of the judicial department. It is true that it is judicial, and yet it is political in its nature. The Constitution has imposed certain duties upon the presiding officer of the Senate, and the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House are competently associated with the Chief Justice. If it be said that nothing will result excepting the loss of the vote of one State unless we make this arrangement, the loss of one State is a great loss; it is an organic loss; it is a loss that may change the character of the whole election; it is a loss that the people of this country would not quietly submit to. It seems to me it is very important that before we pass this bill we should make such arrangement as will secure the vote of every State, for thereby we may avoid civil war.

Those who have written upon this part of the Constitution have predicted that the greatest peril to this country is just at the very point we are now considering; and I see nothing in the amendment which I have offered which is in violation of the Constitution. The Constitution is silent on the subject. It imposes upon the Legislature the duty of making provision for counting the votes. This ture the duty of making provision for counting the votes. This amendment, it seems to me, is an equitable, just, constitutional provision; and, besides, it is dignified, conservative, and proper. It comports with the magnitude of the great question that we should call the head of the judicial department of the country to decide it. The matter referred is a difference between the two Houses. That might be only a question of law. The two Houses might agree on everything excepting a dispute as to some principle of law. The difference between the two Houses is the matter which the amendment proposes to refer. proposes to refer.

I make these suggestions now rather than when the amendment is aken up, because it may have an effect upon the vote which shall taken up, because it may have an effect upon the vote which shall be given upon the pending amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not prepared just now to vote upon any of the propositions which have been suggested; that is, I am not as well prepared as I would like to be. This subject is full of difficulty. For reasons that I gave yesterday, I do not think a matter of disagreement can be referred to the Supreme Court. I do not believe you can confer upon that court as a court any such power. I have seen no reason to change the opinion I expressed yesterday.

Then to give the House of Representatives the right to decide it

Then, to give the House of Representatives the right to decide it may be a matter of necessity, and yet there are very grave considera-tions there, for you put the House under the temptation to disagree with the Senate, so that the result of the disagreement may be that the House will have the decision alone. So, take it any way you will, there is difficulty. I do not believe that we can or ought to confer this power, in the case of disagreement of the Houses, upon the pre-siding officer of either House. I do not think that can be done. What I desire is that we may, in the situation in which we find ourselves placed, one House having a majority of one party and the other House having a majority of the other party, endeavor to come to some understanding that, being agreed upon, will command the support of reasonable men of all parties. I should hope that, if we came to a conclusion satisfactory to the Senate generally, the bill that passes here would receive the approbation of the House of Representatives. If it is made a party question, I do not know what might be the result. I have no right, however, to urge that consideration upon the Senate; but it seems to me very material that we should, possible, arrive at as harmonious a result as can be reached.

In order that we may study the various propositions that have been submitted more than we have yet had time—at least I speak for my-self—as well as other propositions which Senators may desire to lay upon the table, I move that the further consideration of the bill be apon the table, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow, and that the amendments already suggested or that any other Senator may wish to lay before the Senate be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to offer an amendment in the shape of a new section, differing somewhat from either of the amendments that have been offered. I do not wish to speak to it now, and do not know that I shall address the Senate upon it at all. Something better may be offered, but with the view of facilitating the progress of ter may be offered, but, with the view of facilitating the progress of the work, I ask that my amendment may be put with the others and printed in due form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey proposes an amendment. It is not in order now, but it will be submitted.

and printed with the three amendments already pending. Mr. MORTON.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. — Should the two Houses of Congress, acting separately, fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return of such State, then, and in that event only, it shall become the duty of the President of the Senate to make a decision of the question: Provided, the President of the Senate shall render his decision in favor of such return as shall have received a majority of all the votes of both Houses of Congress considered by him as if both Houses had cast their votes in joint meeting assembled.

Mr. HOWE. I shall acquiesce in the motion to postpone very readily, for it will not be regarded as surprising that I should find myself as quite as unprepared to vote satisfactorily to myself as the Senator from Ohio professes himself to be. But I want, before the bill goes over, to make one suggestion which has occurred to me, and which is a suggestion of the difficulty that is presented to my mind as the most obvious one and the one most difficult to meet.

It seems to me that the question of determining what votes shall be counted and what shall not is either a political or a judicial question. If a judicial question, I think it ought to be submitted to some one of the judicial tribunals recognized by the Constitution, and not to a special tribunal manufactured for the purpose. ical question, then shall it be determined by any political department of the National Government or by the political department of the State government? It is manifest to my mind, from looking at the Constitution, that those who framed that instrument never anticipated that the Congress of the United States would be stumbling over a difficulty of this sort. They said that each State shall appoint the electors in just such way as the Legislature may see fit; and it did not apparently occur to the men who made the Constitution that such a scandal as two bodies of men claiming to be the Legislature of a State would ever appear in American history. I wish we could say that no such scandal ever had appeared. It did not occur to the men who made the Constitution that there would be ever, I think, two sets of papers sent up here pretending to be the vote of a State. Therefore it seems to me that they intended to delegate to these two Houses no judicial, no political, no discretionary authority whatever, but simply the ministerial act of opening a letter and reading the contents in the presence of the picked men of all the States; that is

We are not now quite a hundred years old as a nation, as a Gov-ernment considerably less, and we have already been shocked by the appearance of two letters declaring very different results in the same

State upon a presidential vote. The thing we want to guard against, State upon a presidential vote. The thing we want to guard against, if we can by any possibility, is the appearance of any such dispute in the convention hereafter. If you can legislate in any way so as to prevent the appearance in any of the States of two bodies of men claiming to be a legislature, or two bodies of men claiming to be an electoral college, then I think you have accomplished the object. Clearly there can be but one Legislature in a State; there can be but one electoral college of a State, but one body having the right to clearly there can be but one Legislature in a State; there can be but one electoral college of a State; but one body having the right to send the letter declaring the will of a particular State in the choice of President and Vice-President. Dozens of pretenders may appear. Only one is true, and all the rest are sham. 'A dozen bills may be put in circulation of the same number, the same letter, claiming to be issued by the same authority and to rest upon the same credit. One is genuine; all the rest are counterfeit. You have provided laws for punishing everybody who puts in circulation all the sham notes; and punishing everybody who puts in circulation all the sham notes; and if you can provide by law for punishing adequately those who shall forge or counterfeit or issue sham letters or certificates of election, that is a sort of legislation that I would like to engage in. You send the man who issues a forged or counterfeit note to State's prison or somewhere else where he will be out of the way. Precisely where you should put those men who send up to the Congress of the United States a false and counterfeited certificate of the result of a presidential election in a State I am not prepared to say. There is no punishment I can conceive of ever inflicted upon crime too heavy to visit upon the head of such miscreants. Whether those penalties should be imposed by the States, or should be imposed by the national authority, is a question we might well consider; but I do not see this morning how, if you allow such papers to come up here, you are going to provide a tribunal which shall instruct the two Houses which of the two papers is a true one and which is a false one.

Mr. MORTON. As this is a very important question, I shall not object to the postponement, but I venture to express the hope that when we take up the bill to-morrow we shall consider it until it is disposed of, either on to-morrow or as soon thereafter as possible, or somewhere else where he will be out of the way. Precisely disposed of, either on to-morrow or as soon thereafter as possible, without a further postponement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move the amendment which I read to the Senate as an amendment to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] to come in after the word

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee by striking out all after the word "agree" and inserting what he has read, which is to perfect the text while the substitute is pending offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Johnston.] The Senator from Virginia proposes a substitute for the whole amendment, striking out all after the word "and." The rule permits a perfection of the text. The question will be first on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. All these amendments are to be printed, and the question now is whether the whole subject shall be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not rise to repeat what other Senators have said as to the importance of this question. It is important and it is intricate; and because of both those things I venture to make a sug-

The postponement is moved very properly, as I think, in order that the Senator who moves it, and of course that other Senators, may have an opportunity to understand, as they do not yet understand, the bill before us and the various amendments which have been and may be proposed. If the postponement takes place until to-morrow at one o'clock, the Senator from Ohio must see that there is but little force at least in that part of his motion which relates to printing the amendments. Nobody is to see them in print until that time. Possibly they may be found in the morning in the RECORD, if one can sibly they may be found in the morning in the Record, if one can get time in the morning before the meeting of the Senate to study them. I rather think it would be better if this matter should stand until day after to-morrow, perhaps, and be made a special order, if the Senator from Indiana thinks there is any danger of its being displaced. I should not at all be surprised if a conclusion might be reached as soon if now it is known that it is to be considered at that time, Senators having time to look at the subject generally and to look at these amendments, as it would be if taken up at one o'clock to-morrow, when really very little opportunity will be given after the amendments are in print to study them. I have no convenience of my own about it.

of my own about it.

Mr. THURMAN. If it would be agreeable to the Senator from Indiana who has the bill in charge to fix the day after to-morrow, I will very willingly modify my motion.

Mr. CONKLING. As I was saying, I have no convenience of my own about it at all, except that, having been out of the Senate yesterday, very likely I am less informed, and no doubt I am, than any other Senator; but it strikes me that the object being to enable all of us to be prepared to form and express an opinion about it, we had better have a time within which that can be done than to fix a time within which we know it cannot be done.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing to acquiesce in the suggestion of the Senator from New York. I understand it would be agreeable to the Senator who has the bill in charge, and therefore I modify my motion to postpone the bill until one o'clock on Thursday and make it the special order for that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio modifies his motion, postponing the bill until Thursday at one o'clock and making it the special order at that time.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to the bill going over until Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to the bill going over until that time; but we are aware that a special order has no weight, that it is only a method of postponing a matter indefinitely. It seems to me that there ought to be a sort of understanding—I will not say expressed, but a kind of understanding—that the unfinished business of Wednesday shall not put the bill out of the charge of the Senate. I do not ask a change of the rule in reference to special orders, but I am willing that in this particular case, which ought to be attended to early in this session and ought to be considered in the other House, the bill going over until day after to-morrow it shall be with the understanding that it will be considered on that day.

derstanding that it will be considered on that day.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to suggest that no objection has appeared here, and I imagine that there will be no objection, that by unanimous consent the Senator from Indiana can have an understanding that when at one o'clock on Thursday he moves to take up this bill, he shall have the vote of everybody in the Senate to take it up. In that case we do not want it made a special order.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to have that understanding up. In that case Mr. MORTON.

I wish to have that understanding. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That must be done by unanimous consent. A special order cannot displace unfinished business. Is there objection? There is no objection; and, by unanimous consent, the bill will come up on Thursday at one o'clock.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 546, to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado. It is a bill which ought to be passed, and to which I assume there will be no objection at all, as there is now no provision when that State comes in for continuing the administration of justice in the United States courts at all or in the territorial courts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado.

The first section provides that when the State of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union, according to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within that State as elsewhere within the United States; that it shall constitute one judicial district, to be called the district of Colorado; that a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties provided by law for similar officers in the other States, except as herein otherwise provided. The district of Colorado is to be attached to and constitute a part of the eighth judicial circuit, and a term of the circuit court and district court is to be held at Denver on the first Tuesday of and on the first Tuesday of in each year.

The second section invests the circuit and district courts for the district of Colorado, and the judges thereof respectively, with the same powers and jurisdiction of other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States

The third section fixes the compensation of the district judge for the district of Colorado at $3,500 a year. The fourth section provides that the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of the circuit and district courts of Colorado, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for their services receive the fees and compensation allowed to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties by the laws of the United States, excepting such provisions thereof as are specially applicable to some par-ticular officer or district.

Under the fifth section all cases of appeal or writ of error hereto-fore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Colorado, or that may hereafter be lawfully prosecuted from that court, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the remand of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the district of Colorado, or to the supreme court of the State of Colorado, as the nature of the case may require; and each of the last-mentioned courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Colorado Territory as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process

The sixth section provides that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of Colorado prior to its admission as a State the parties to such judgments shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of the State into the Union.

The seventh section declares that until the judge for the district of Colorado shall be duly appointed, the district judge of the United States for the district of Nebraska shall act as the district judge of Colorado.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was to insert at the end of section 1 the following

And one grand jury and one petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 6, line 2, before the word "Colorado" to insert the words "the Territory of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to fill the blanks on page 2, line 22, the first blank with the word "July" and the second blank with the word "December.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend section 7, line 2, by inserting after the word "appointed" the words "and qualified." I think probably that that is a little improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of the said commissioners, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of

A bill (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia; and A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of the said commissioners, and for other purposes.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 172, fixing the salary of the President of the United

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that from and after the 4th of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it would be ineffable meanness on the part of the American Congress to reduce the salary of the President of the United States below that which is received by the minister of England serving in this city. I do not desire to elaborate that proposition at all. It strikes me very forcibly. I think that on due consideration the salary of the President was raised to $50,000. I simply desire the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and call for them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?" on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on all political questions; but not regarding this as a political question, I vote "nay."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll; which resulted—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Christianey, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Boutwell, Cooper, Davis, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalis, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McMillan, Mitchell, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Windom, and Withers—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Gordon, Johnston, Kelly, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wadleigh, and West—27.

So the bill was passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest that we proceed with the Calendar of un-objected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the next case on the Calendar in order will be reported.

HOLIDAYS IN THE DISTRICT.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 493) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD. Let that go over. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JAMES A. HILE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of Warto issue to James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late a soldier of Company F, Twenty-first Regiment of Missouri Infantry Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the service, and to so amend the records and muster-rolls of the War Department as to show that he is no deserter; and he is to be entitled to all pay and bounty as other soldiers of his rank and arm of service, deducting the time of his absence.

Mr. SARGENT. I have some doubt in reference to the passage of these bills, because I am not entirely sure that the Treasury of the United States is in a condition to bear such drafts upon it. The Senate has determined by the bill it has just passed to reduce the salary of the President of the United States after the 4th of next March from $50,000 to $25,000. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I have been somewhat puzzled to know what to do with the propositions which have come to us from the House of Representatives reducing salaries everywhere and crippling, as I thought, the service of the country generally. But, if the Senate itself takes the initiative in cutting down salaries, cutting them down one-half, the doubt is considerably solved in my own mind, and I think that prudence might induce particular Senators not to be outstripped by the general body or by the House in the rush to obtain the popular eye.

The salary of the president of France is $120,000 per annum under a republican government, besides which he receives $78,000 with which to defray expenses of receptions and public entertainments. That is the salary of republican France. Of course France is a wealthy country. It has a debt larger than ours, but it has an industrious population and considerable resources. We have an industrious population and considerable resources. dustrious population and considerable resources. We have an industrious population and boundless resources. We deliberately cut down the salary of the President of the United States from $50,000, which is less than a fourth of that paid in France, to $25,000, an eighth of that amount. The salary of the minister of England to this country, residing here in Washington, is but a little less than $40,000, besides allowances made to him for other purposes. We propose by the legislation which we have adopted to-day to give the President about one-half the salary he receives. one-half the salary he receives.

The salary of the President of the United States was fixed in the first year of the Republic, when a dollar was worth eight times what it is at the present day. We put the salary of the President of the United States back to a point where it was at that time, although the salaries of members of Congress have been increased almost by geometrical ratio, and nobody rushes in here in haste to reduce our sala-I know there is a proposition at the other end of the Capitol to ries. I know there is a proposition at the other end of the Capitol to do it, but not like this, to take off some percentage of it, and not to divide it in two. Why not throw our own offerings on the altar, if the country is so burdened, if salaries are to be cut down?

It has been proposed, and the bill is pending, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to reduce our minister in England from $17,500 to $14,000. It is not so great a reduction as that which we have just made in the salary of the President of the United States. It seems to me that this vote is an instruction to the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill with the reduction the other House has propriations to report the bill with the reduction the other House has made, or a still larger reduction. So it goes all through the service.

I do not know that we can afford to pass the bill which is now before us, or any of these bills taking money out of the Treasury, or to vote anything except for bare actual necessities. All ideas of generosity of course must be thrown away and discouraged. The country ostry of course must be thrown away and discouraged. The country is so impoverished; we are going so rapidly to ruin, plunging so terribly into bankruptcy, as Senators seem to think, that we are not only ashamed of ourselves, but we are guilty of meanness. I think, Mr. President, that the bill which we have just passed ought to be reconsidered; and if there is any purpose to destroy the public service, let it not originate in this Chamber.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know exactly what latitude of debate is present in this bedry, but after the remarks of the Senator from Col.

mr. DAWES. I do not know exactly what latitude of decate is proper in this body; but after the remarks of the Senator from California, perhaps something ought to follow. It is not to be wondered at that the Senator from California should feel aggrieved at the action of the Senate a few moments since; for I believe he is entitled to the fathership of the measure which raised the President's salary. I had some little participation in the discussion of the measure which, starting as it did with a proposition of the Senator from California to raise the salary of the President of the United States to $50,000, ended (as I foresaw and predicted at the time to those who suggested that it was possible to single out his salary and raise it to $50,000 and leave all else as it was) in one grand scheme so sandwiched in be-tween the necessitous appropriations of the Government, and upon a bill providing for carrying on the Government, that the choice constrained its passage.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I wish to ask whether this discussion is in order, no motion being made for the reconsideration of the bill in regard to the President's

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perfectly in order; it illustrates the pending question

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It has nothing to do with the pending ques tion. In order to render it strictly in order, I will move a reconsideration of the vote on the bill which has just passed relative to the President's salary, having voted for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves a reconsideration of the vote on the bill for the reduction of the President's salary.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask whether that motion is in order pending the consideration of another bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can enter the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can be entered, but not considered. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Mr. DAWES. I do not propose to force myself on the Senate out of order. The only reason I supposed it was in order was, because an older Senator in this body had proceeded to discuss the question; and it occurred to me that it might be in order to follow him.

The movement to which I alluded did result, Mr. President, if I am notout of order, in just what I predicted, and against which I struggled, and which at that time I felt it my duty to say I would at all times be ready to undo, so far as it could be undone. The consequences of it to those who participated in it I need not allude to. Those consequences, if they had ended with the authors of it, I should not have troubled myself about; but they reached others and produced other results and other effects upon the country very serious in my opinion and from which we have not entirely recovered.

Every attempt to retrace the mistake that we then fell into I think Livery attempt to retrace the mistake that we then fell into I think I have seconded; and now, in a shape the only one that the Constitution permits, and at a time most favorable for that, when it can reflect upon no incumbent, and can be prompted by no consideration invidious to either incumbent or coming occupant of the chair, a measure is presented which enables us to conform to the public judgment, for if the people of the United States have pronounced an unmistakable judgment upon anything in the world they have upon

Mr. EDMUNDS. The President's salary?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir. I mean in relation to the President's salary as much as any other part of the act of 1873. They condemned the attempt to increase the salaries of officials at so long a period after the war, after the necessary increase of expenses had reached its maximum and was on the decline, when the country was burdened with taxation, and the effort was to cut down expenditures in every quarter that would justify it, and the anxiety to do it had led to legislation in some quarters that impaired the efficiency of the service. At such a time to originate or now to resist any attempt to go back to that compensation for public officials which had continued up to a time when the expenses of maintaining one's self in these official positions had begun to lessen, and there was no prospect of their increase, it hardly becomes any one to say is "mean."

Certainly I think it is necessary, if we go into any reduction of public expenditures, that we should carry along with it, as far as it can be, consistently with efficiency to the public service, a reduction of compensation as well and in my conjuic that is an evil day to the of compensation as well, and in my opinion that is an evil day to the Republic when men seek places of honor that should be places of honor and of trust in this nation for the compensation. A compensation one dollar beyond that which will defray expenditures is a compensation which is an invitation to seek the place for the money that can be made therein, and its effect upon the public service itself that can be made therein, and its effect upon the public service itself is anything but beneficial. The highest compensations are not followed with the greatest purity in the public service, and never will be in a country like this, and it does not commend resistance to the bill which has just passed, to my mind, that the president of the French republic gets a great deal more than $50,000 a year for his services. The Prince of Wales has a revenue granted him out of the poor operatives of England, starving to-day, that it is not worth while to bring up here as an example of purity in official position.

Sir, I regret that there should be the slightest opposition to retracting, as far as the Constitution itself will permit, every step taken in ing, as far as the Constitution itself will permit, every step taken in that most unfortunate and unwise and pernicious measure, out of which there is left, I believe, only this single instance that can be reached by legislation, and I think that the country itself, had we failed to pass the bill just acted on, would have held this body responsible for an attempt to throw itself across the public judgment in

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the long experience of the Senator from Massachusetts has enabled him to see better than I have the previous instances where salaries of members of Congress have been increased after the session had begun, and has participated in that increase. He knows that the manner in which the bill was passed the last time was not unusual. I have sent for the record of that debate; however, it is a matter of no consequence; but I should like to show that, so far as the increase of the compensation of members of Congress is concerned, I denounced it severely on the floor of the House, especially the retroactive feature. I never voted for it except at the last moment when it was necessary to save a $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 appropriation bill on which I had labored with others in the committee assiduously for over a month. That is my record on that proposition. But on this single one, which I brought in as a separate measure, to put the salary of the President of the United States at something proportioned to the importance and expensiveness of the office, I made my proposition clearly and distinctly understood that I designed it to stand alone by itself, and I thought it was exceptional, or that if there was any exception at all perhaps it would be the salaries of the Cabinet ministers, which I thought were rather low.

I do not know that I care to prolong this debate. When it is more strictly in order on a motion to reconsider I may perhaps desire to be further heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say now, Mr. President, without going into any discussion of this matter, that, if I had been present going into any discussion of this matter, that, if I had been present when the bill of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] was voted upon, I should have voted against its passage. I left the Chamber on a matter of business and imagined the debate would go on for some time. When I came back I found that the bill had passed. I do not think that the people of this country so far as I know them have ever found any fault with that part of what was called the "salary-grab bill" which increased the salary of the President of the United States. There was not any particular "grab" about that that they saw. The "grab" that it was styled was found in the votes of those Senators and members of Congress who had been set aside by their constituand members of Congress who had been set aside by their constitu-encies, who took that means (with the best motives no doubt) to replen-ish their pockets before they left Washington for the last time. That was what the people thought was "a little tough," as the saying is, and was what led us at the earliest moment to endeavor to correct that wrong. Of course we could not get the money back, but we could show our indignation at the performance in the way we did. Sir, the people of the United States are not a mean people. They do not wish that the President of this great nation should live as they live, and we all live when we are at home and when we are here, the most of us, too, in the most slender way; buy a piece of beef to-day and make it last in the form of cold meat to-morrow, and forage the and make it last in the form of cold meat to-morrow, and forage the next day, and soup the third, and so on, in order to get on in the best way we can. They do not desire that. The Presidency of this nation is a very great office. The people are all interested in it; they are interested in its dignity, if I am not offensive in using the word "dignity" as applied now-a-days to any office that is held in this nation; they are interested that it shall be kept up in that style and honorable condition that belong to so high an office. They are interested that the President of the United States, being bound to inform himself upon all affairs, foreign and domestic, should be able to see at his self upon all affairs, foreign and domestic, should be able to see at his official residence the representatives of foreign powers, citizens of foreign states, distinguished citizens of our own country, under circumstances which enable him to acquaint himself with the condition of the affairs of mankind. They know enough to know that that cannot be done without the expenditure of large sums of money in respect of keeping up a household and dispensing hospitality; and, therefore, I do not think that the people of this country, the tax-payers, the operatives even, would wish to make the salary of the President a dollar less than is fairly adequate for the expenses of the kind

So then, without going into any discussion of the subject, I wish to say that, had I been present at the moment, I should have voted against the passage of the bill, and should have taken whatever fate befell me at home for doing so.

befell me at home for doing so.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the bill touching the salary of the President of the United States is not, I believe, before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CONKLING. Nevertheless, as some Senators have indulged in the privilege of saying a word in regard to it, I wish to participate in the privilege, my chief wish being to disclaim all credit for sharing in several sentiments which I hear expressed by other Senators.

I voted for the bill to repeal the act which increased the salary of the President. Of course I voted in effect to reduce that salary after the President. Of course I voted in effect to reduce that salary after the earliest day when we have power to do it, to leave it, after that day, one-half the sum at which it now stands. I wish to say, first in reference to some observations which fell from the honorable Senator from California, that I did not mean by that vote to express my opinion as an original question upon the size of the salary, upon the sum which that salary should be. On the other hand, I did not intend to express all the opinions which I have heard intimated touching the legislation which this act intended to undo, but I did mean a very simple thing which I can frankly state.

Had the vote put to the Senate on this bill been a mere opportunity to enter into a competition with those who are striving to exhibit an excessive anxiety about what is popularly known as economy, the question would have been quite different from the one which addressed itself to me. I voted originally against the increase. I voted against the great appropriation bill in which the increase was an item. I so voted in the presence of not only the probability but the certainty that the defeat of that appropriation bill would necessitate an extra session of Congress. And all that I felt bound to do because I believed that untimely, unwise, and improper was the raising of salaries which took place in that bill. It was against my judgment at that time as my vote attested. Now, when a bill is introduced the purpose of which is to undo what was then done, to put in statu quo, as far as has not already been done by previous legislation, the whole matter, I feel bound to vote in accordance with my vote and my judgmatter, I feel bound to vote in accordance with my vote and my judgment then and my judgment now.

I say this, Mr. President, as I began by remarking, first to disavow the intention of expressing any original judgment as to what as an original question it would be right to affix as a salary to the presidential office. I do it also to disclaim sympathy with many things which have been said touching that legislation. Ineverfelt it a part of my duty to challenge the motives of those who differed with me in judgment. I always thought that I discharged my duty sufficiently when I voted as I believed, which belief was adverse to that legislation. I never felt bound to go through the ceremony of returnlegislation. I never felt bound to go through the ceremony of returning my money, as it was called, to the Treasury, or to write letters in regard to it. I always conceived that any man who thought he ought not to receive the extra compensation discharged his duty sufficiently by holding his peace, by letting the money alone, and by leaving it to be covered into the Treasury, as it was covered into the Treasury by operation of law. It seems to me by parity of reasoning that it is enough for me, without questioning the judgment or the motives of others, to vote, as I think consistency and conviction require, to put back the remainder of this increase of salary where it quire, to put back the remainder of this increase of salary where it was, and then when by separate legislation at any time which seems to me a proper time, should I have a vote on this subject, I will address myself to the question what is right under the circumstances as an original matter, and what should be the measure of the presidential salary and of every other salary. But because of the manner and the time in which this occurred, it seemed to me it ought not be done, and it seems to me now proper for me, without going to other questions, to vote to undo what then was done.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, as this seems to be a sort of free-inquiry meeting, in which we are all at liberty to relate our experiences, I want to say a word about mine.

I voted against the bill to reduce the salary of the President of the United States from $50,000 to $25,000 for the simple reason that I thought $25,000 was too small a sum to pay a President of the United thought $25,000 was too small a sum to pay a President of the United States, and I did not think $50,000 was too large a sum to pay him. I think with the Senator from Vermont that the people of the United States are not a mean people. I have been told that when they were very few, and in comparison with the present day very poor, they thought they could afford to pay the President of the United States $25,000 per annum. We now number more than forty millions—a great deal of ability to pay salaries. I take it that our fathers never concluded to pay $25,000 upon the theory that that was only a fair compensation for the services of the President. They meant to cover something more than his services. It was more than an adequate compensation —much more than an adequate compensation for the labors of the best men the Republic bred at that time, and it bred as good men at best men the Republic bred at that time, and it bred as good men at best men the kepublic bred at that time, and it bred as good men at that time as it does at this time and no better. It was too much, however, to pay for the services of any one man. They meant it to cover something more. That was suggested by the fact that they furnished him a house, a very large house to live in, a house adequate to the accommodation of a good deal more than himself and his own family. It was expected that he would accommodate more; that he would accommodate more; that he would entertain; that in the name of the people of the United States he would administer something like hospitality, and they did not intend that it should be a niggardly and stingy kind of hospitality, and indeed it never has been.

I think every Senator about me knows that the time has now come when a liberal and generous hospitality cannot be administered here in the city of Washington for $25,000 a year. What it does cost I do not know from any personal experience. My experience does not go so far as that; but I take it there are a number of Senators on this floor who can testify upon that point, and give very conclusive testimony. This is the fact to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, that when we were poor and few, we thought we could afford $25,000 to keep up the house of the President of the United States. Now is the record to be made that when we number more than forty millions and are as rich as we are to-day—I speak of the nation and not of individuals—we can afford no more? If that is so, I do think the public conclusion will be that, in whatever other graces the peo-

the public conclusion will be that, in whatever other graces the people of the United States may have grown within the last seventy-five years, they have not grown in that becoming grace of generosity.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to have heard the remarks which fell from the lips of the distinguished Senator from California, that because we would not allow the President of the United States to receive a salary of $50,000 a year, therefore a maimed and blind soldier of the war who is now poverty-stricken a maimed and blind soldier of the war who is now poverty-stricken and unable to obtain the necessaries of life by physical labor, shall be deprived of what is justly due to him.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course the Senator understood that I was not discussing the merits of this bill. It was simply a frame on which to hang remarks on another subject. I hardly knew the title of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am glad to know that the distinguished Senator was not discussing the merits of the bill, for I regretted to hear such expressions or that he should use language capable of being interpreted in that way. I hope that this bill will pass; and when this bill has passed the salary bill can be discussed to the satisfaction and contentment of all the Senators. For one I voted "yea." I beand contentment of all the Senators. For one I voted "yea." I believe that $25,000 is an ample salary for any honest and competent man to fill that high position with honor and credit and dignity to himself and to all the people of this great country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARK W. DELAHAY.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I move that the bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of Mark W. Delahay, now on the Calendar with an adverse report, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims with additional evidence.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say with reference to that, that additional evidence has come into the possession of the committee, and there is no objection to the recommittal of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. FORT. I merely want it referred.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

PENSION-APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriation for the payment of in-valid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and moved that said amendments be concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS. The original bill itemized the fund appropriated somewhat, but the Senate concluded to put the appropriation for invalid pensions and for widows and children of invalid pensioners all together. The Committee on Appropriations think it quite right and proper to concur in that amendment.

Mr. FORT. Is that report in order?

Mr. RANDALL. It makes a final disposition of the pension-appropriation bill and will take but a moment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order that these amendments must have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will sustain that point of order if it be pressed.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask that the amendments be read. The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "$14,100,000," and insert "and."

Senate; and they were concurred in-ayes 94, noes not counted. Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. KASSON. In view of the increasing illness among members of the House and the extraordinary bad ventilation which we experience this morning, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to examine into the cause of the bad ventilation of this House, and be authorized to direct such improvements therein as they may find necessary and expedient to increase the healthfulness of the atmosphere.

There are other gentlemen who are perhaps more sensitive than myself on this subject, and I hope that if they have anything to say they will state it to the House.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment on this subject, and I thank the gentleman from Iowa for a moment on this subject, and I thank the gentleman from lowa for having introduced the resolution he has done. My object in coming to the House this morning was to ask the privilege which seems to be accorded to me, to bring to the attention of members what I regard—I think I may use the term with propriety—as the murderous system of ventilation now in practice in this House. It is a close box. If gentlemen will east their eyes around they will see that there is no escape except when a door is casually opened in the galleries above. Air is forced into the Hall in a way eminently injurious to health and Air is forced into the Hall in a way eminently injurious to health and life; currents of air, now hot and now cold, are brought in at the back of each member by artificial power. When I lay my hand at the rear of the seat of my neighbor here a draught of cold air assails me. I have been taught through my whole life that a draught of cold air is an enemy to be faced; that, whether riding or resting, I should turn my breast and not my spine to that enemy, so often fatal.

My experience in this Hall within a week has brought me twice to a very full realization of my mortality. And on last Thursday, for a few minutes, I sat feeling, as the warm blood gurgled in my throat and came from me in volume, that at last I confronted the dread summoner. I attribute it to what I have already called "the murder-ous ventilation" of this Hall. Having in the early part of the week suffered a slight hemorrhage, on Thursday last I took my seat again in this Hall. In a little while I felt that a chill was creeping over my whole system, assailing first the spine. I discovered, but not until too late, that a draught of cold air was being blown with a terrible force upon my back from here, [pointing behind his chair,] as it may be blown at any moment on the back of any member of this House. I have since learned that by turns we each experienced draughts of hot and cold air thus blown upon our spines each day.

While at home I heard of the probable fatal illness of my colleague, With at nome I heard of the probable latar limess of my conteague, Hon. WINTHROP W. KETCHUM, who, though he has quivered for a day or two between life and death, with death seeming imminent, I am happy to say is slightly improved to-day. I hear that Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, is detained in his room, and hanging in even balance between life and death, from the same cause. I have been told that no less than thirteen members of this House were detained from it by illness which wight he nearly associable to the tained from it by illness, which might be partly ascribable to the general atmosphere of this Hall, and to the fact that while under its baleful influence their backs are daily bathed with active streams of

This, at least, may be stopped for the present. The doors above, in the galleries, may be thrown open. If no mechanism can keep them open, let them be taken from their hinges, that there may be some possibility of a change of air in the Hall without this fatal process. I regard it as fatal, not only from my observations in this Hall, but because science has once before in my public official career prescribed the same fatal remedy.

For some years I was judge of one of the most important courts of Philadelphia. The court-rooms were badly ventilated, and a man of Philadelphia. The court-rooms were badly ventilated, and a man or reputed science was employed to improve the ventilation. He cut an aperture in the floor of the room, in the ceiling of the cellar, and put in what he called a ventilating apparatus, for blowing into the court-room the air of the cellar, or that which came into the open windows of the cellar. The cold air was projected at the feet of the jurors, at the end of the jury-box. Before the first session of the court had ended, three jurors had suddenly died; and medical science declared that they had been murdered by scientific ventilation, from sitting in a heated room with bad atmosphere, and having a current of cold in a heated room with bad atmosphere, and having a current of cold air thrown upon their feet at intervals during the day, and especially while the brain was actively employed and under unusual excitement.

I therefore hope the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] will be adopted; and that meanwhile the engineer will be prohibited from prostrating any more members with pneumonia, or other affections of the kind, by fanning the spinal columns of members of this House with cold air during its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Probably it may be well to explain that there is now a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Changle who have this matter in charge. now a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds who have this matter in charge. The ventilation of this Hall is certainly defective. I myself spent several hours a few days since, on Saturday last, going through the space that is between the roof of this Hall and the sky-lights above. There are perforations all around the ceiling of this Hall to permit the escape of the atmosphere of the room, to carry it above, where by an exhaust immediately above the Synchronic in several interface and in the transition. ately above the Speaker it is carried into a flue, and in that way the purpose is to purify this room. I took the pains to carry a lighted cigar along so as to test the motions of the atmosphere. It was not scientific, but I found it exceedingly—scientific, but I found it exceed Mr. GARFIELD. Agreeable.

Mr. HARRISON. Both agreeable and satisfactory. I found that from this half of the Hall [indicating the north side of the Hall] the atmosphere rises up, goes through these perforations and into the exhaust. On the south side of the Hall, instead of the atmosphere rising up and going off through the exhaust it ascends to the ceiling, becomes cold and impure and falls back into the Hall. So far from the perforations on that side, [indicating the south side of the Hall,] about one-third of this Hall, carrying off the impurities of the room, the impure atmosphere falls back into the room more deadly than
